CHAPTER IX.

The balance of this singular night in Valparaiso passes without adventure. Doctor Jack, taking warning from what has already occurred, does not neglect the proper precautions for safety, and while the door is secured, no one could possibly enter at the window, left open for air, without disturbing his slumbers, and to arouse a man of his caliber would be a poor piece of business for the daring intruder, whose reception must partake of a more serious nature than a sudden hot water shower-bath.

So the day comes, that fateful October day that almost precipitates a bloody war between the valiant little South American free country and the greatest republic the world has ever seen. It opens auspiciously for Jack.

As he comes down stairs he is accosted by a man who has just entered Valparaiso's chief caravansary-a man upon whom the dust of travel rests, and who has undoubtedly ridden far and hard. At sight of him Doctor Jack receives a shock, for although the man's face is soiled with dust and perspiration, he re-

"Kirke Smith!" bursts from his lips. The man holds out his hand, which is seized by Doctor Jack and heartily squeezed. Then the two step aside to a quiet corner where they may talk without being overheard, for already several Chilians watch them with interest. "You are twelve hours ahead, Kirke. What am I to believe, good or bad news?" is the first thing Jack Evans

"Both." returns the Texan rider, whose equal on a horse it would be hard Doctor Jack preserves his wonderful calmness, although his whole fortune is at stake. The man's nerve is simply astonishing, and it has won him more than one battle in the past.

"Explain what you mean, my dear fellow. Have you brought it with you?" "Yes; lost it on the way and recovered it again. I've ridden like Satan, Jack, and met with some adventures that will do to amuse you another time." "Quite right-they'll keep, Now, where is the-package you were to fetch?" "Concealed outside the city. I dared not bring it in until I had seen you." Doctor Jack heaves a deep sigh of re-"That much is safe, then. Once we get it on board the steamer all will be

"When do you sail?"

"In the morning, and you also, Kirke, my boy. Don't think I mean to lose sight of you so easily. Besides, your presence may be needed to confirm the statements in New York." "Are you bound there," with eager

"Possibly. I have received news in the last ten hours that makes me alter my plans. Your coming, with words of cheer, brightens the skies, which were getting very dark above. I am surrounded by enemies here, and can hardly turn without knocking the elbow of a man who hopes to pick a quarrel." The other gives a low whistle of surprise, but his face expresses no alarm. Kirke Smith has been in some of the most desperate situations ever faced by a human being, and no one ever knew him to flinch. Up comes Larry at this juncture, and is delighted to see the man for whom

Jack has been waiting, on the ground, His idea is that they can go on board the steamer at once, but is met by the reply that, however profitable such a move might be, it is not to be thought of until evening comes. A boat will be engaged and kept in waiting at a certain point most convenient and when they have secured that which Kirke Smith dares not bring into Valparaiso in broad daylight, a short pull will bring them to the steamer. All they must avoid will be the Argus eyes of the enemies whom Jack and his trusted agent have thus far baffled, and it may be set down as certain that these men will be constantly on the alert. The hard rider who comes from the nitrate region of Chili goes to brush up a little, and then appears ready for breakfast. Avis joins them, and in low tones they converse. Kirke has much of dramatic interest to tell, and holds them spellbound while he relates his adventures. To not a soul, however, does he confide the secret of where he has hidden that treasure which he has carried so far, and defended as only a brave man could, Who can tell what hostile ears may not be bent to catch his words? The secret must only be whispered in the solitude of privacy, if spoken at all. Larry has something on his mindthis fact Doctor Jack notices, and it causes him to watch the little man curilously. Perhaps he has fallen in love with the beautiful senorita to whom Doctor Jack owed his trouble on the preceding night. As this thought flashes through his mind it troubles him, since the duds can be as stubborn as a mule once his mind is made up, and it is hoped he will sail when they do. So Jack determines to put him on the rack, Larry knows something-that is evident-and his tongue once limbered presently discourses upon the subject uppermost in his thoughts,

"I have weceived a lettah this a. m. -a communication of immense importance, dear boy. You wemember the lovely chawmer upon whose shoulder your head weelined last night. Well, she's given you up, Jack," with a leer.
"Glad to hear it," says that worthy,

"She's after new game, Another sun AND IRON, has risen above the horizon, and, by Jove! this one isn't mortgaged, either," pulling at the shadowy fringe that adorns his cheeks. "Am I to understand it is you, Larry?" The small man puffs out his chest until he resembles a pouter pigeon. "I'm the victim of her second passion -a case of love at first sight. I fancied that she twembled last night when I looked at her-a powerful sight of magnetism in that glance, dear boy," and he accompanies his words with a laugh that puzzles the doctor. "And she wrote you?" he asks, suspi-

as he and his friends expected to sail in the morning this would not be profitable. When it became evident that he was inwilling to obey her request, Marilla descended to threats. She found an obtinate little man in Larry Kennedy. Nothing could move him, and so another tep was taken.

The senorita clapped her hands and two native servants appeared, either of whom should have been able to have demolished the dude. These the infuriated woman set upon him much in the manner in which she might have urged a pack of hounds after game.

Larry grouped at his foolishness in coming without arms, but he was not the one to give in without a desperate str gle. They found the toughest little sub ject in the dude they had ever tackled. He slipped from their grasp, dealt them sudden blows, scratched like a tiger cat, shricked in their ears, and gave them all the fight they wanted, for they were house servants and not soldiers used to
