among the ponderous machinery. Not long since one "hand" had stabbed another, fatally; and, still later, a factory girl had committed suicide. These things created a ripple, nothing more. It would ill become a town, boasting its aristocracy and "style" to grow frenzied over the woes of such common people. But W- possessed a goodly number of wealthy families, and some blue blood. These were worthy of consideration, and upon these calamity had fallen. Let us read an extract or two

One of the long windows comes of the best old Dutch stock, and had been opened by forcing the shutters, and then cutting out a pane of glass, after which the bolts were easily drawn. "Miss Wardour was at once aroused, and further examination disclosed the fact that her dressing room had been invaded, and every box, trunk and drawer searched. The beautiful little affair, which has the appearance of a miniature combined desk and bookcase, but which contains a small safe that Miss Wardour believed burglar proof, had been forced, and the jewels so widely known as the 'Wardour diamonds,'

"Most of our readers are familiar with the history of the Wardour diamonds, and know that they represented a fortune. "The burglary was effected without noise, not a sound disturbing Miss Wardour, or any of her servants, some of whom are light sleepers, and they have not a single clue by which to trace the

This was shock number one for the public of W-. Miss Constance Wardour, of Wardour Place, was a lady of distinction. She possessed the oldest name, the bluest blood, the fairest face, and the longest purse, to be found in W-; and, the Argus had said truly, the Wardour diaand beyond this a grassy slope that curves monds represented a fortune, and not a down to meet the river, that is ever Emmeline Wardour, the great grand mother of Miss Constance, was a belle and heiress. Her fondness for rare jewels amounted to a mania, and she spent enormous sums in collecting rare gems. At her death she bequeathed to her daughter a collection such as is owned by few ladies in private life. She also bequeathed to her daughter her mania. This daughter, after whom Constance was named, added to her mother's store of precious stones, from time to time, and when, one fine day, a bank, in which she had deposited some thousands of her dollars, failed, and she found herself a loser, she brought her craze to climax, by converting all her money into diamonds, set and unset. At her death, her granddaughter, Constance, inherited these treasures, in addition to a handsome fortune from her mother: and, although the original collection made by Emmeline Wardour contained a variety of rare stones, opals, amethysts, pearls, cameos, etc., besides the many fine diamonds, they all came to be classed under the head of the Wardour diamonds.

It is small wonder that W- stood aghast at the thought of such robbery, and it is impossible to say when the talk, the wonderment, the conjectures, suggestions, theories, and general indignation would have ended, had not the second shock overborne the first. Once more let the Argus speak:-"A STARTLING DISCOVERY.

"Yesterday afternoon, while the town was filled with the excitement caused by the Wardour robbery, Miss Sybil Lamotte, the beautiful daughter of our wealthy and highly respected citizen, found a most delightful home with that Jasper Lamotte, Esq., eloped with John 1 young lady, ever since the death of Burrill, who was, for a time, foreman in Grandmamma Wardour, for Constance one of her father's mills. He was en route for the city, to procure the services of detectives, in the hope of recovering the Wardour diamonds; both his sons were absent from home as well. Mr. Lamotte has not yet returned, and is still ignoran of his daughter's flight. Thus abruptly and reluctantly ends the second Argus bombshell, and this same last bombshell had been a very different thing to handle. It might have been ously worded lines: "It was a monstrous mesalliance, and a great deal could be said in disparagement of Mr. John Burrill;" but Mr. Lamette was absent; the brothers Lamotte were absent, and until he was certain what steps they would take in this matter, it were wise to err on the safe side. Without heeding this last remark, Constance Wardour throws open the door, and passes out and down the hall to meet the party just entering. There is Mr. Soames, the mayor o' V-, very bustling and important; Co: liss, the constable, exceedingly shrewd in his own opinion, and looking on this occasion as wise as an owl; Thomas Craig, Esq., sub-editor of the Argus: and some lesser lights, who, on one
