CHAPTER III.

It is not into the frowing tubes of a revolver that Doctor Jack stares as he wheels in that Cihlian parlor, but something just about as deadly to the peace of man-the fascinating eyes of a rarely beautiful woman. She is of Spanish blood-her dusky orbs and olive complexion betray this fact. Jack has seen many lovely women in his time, but surely never one like the person who stands there and looks into his face-her gaze is peculiar, too, since it seems to fascinate, to a certain extent. "Pardon, but I have come here to meet the writer of a note," he says. She gives him a captivating smile.

"I would see Don Rafael, if it please you, senorita.' "He is in Santiago." "But—the letter—' "I wrote myself, senor," again smiling.

Doctor Jack bows, accepting the situa-

"Yes, I know it, Senor Evans," she says, softly.

"Then my interview must be with "Are you sorry, Doctor Jack?" This man is no fool-he detects the varied emotions of her voice, and knows she has entered upon the game she plays with a motive. As yet he cannot guess it -he is far from being conceited-ignores the fact of his fine physique and handsome face-cares only for the love and devotion of one woman in all this wide world, and that-his wife. At the same time he is a gentleman,

"Then you have seen me in your dreams-you believe in souls leaving their earthly tenement during sleep and holding intercourse with other congenial company, from whom in life they may ever be separated?" "Ah! that is something I have never bothered my head about. I simply meant that in dreams we often see faces, and are startled at meeting their fac-similes later. But senorita, I have come here, braving what danger lies upon your streets after the recent disturbances"with an involuntary glance at his hand and the bruised knuckle-to hear what you have to say concerning my affairs. You will therefore pardon me if I ask you to proceed to business that I may return to the fonda." At his words a change flashes over the lovely tace of the Chilian beauty. "You are anxious to return to your wife?" she cannot help saving. "That is quite true, senorita," he replies, stoutly, and then adds: "You know there has been much lawlessness in Valparaiso since the Balmaceda party was defeated, and I am uneasy about
