those who have given them so much trouble are in the same car as herself, and, perhaps, even then watching her back of the drawn curtains screening the plate-glass window between the car and the state room. When Jack later on communicates the startling intelligence to her, she is visibly disturbed. The presence of her husband reassures her. He has ridden over all difficulties thus far, and they are halflooks as though Doctor Jack and his way across the continent, so it is fair to presume that he will be able to keep up the good work. Her confidence in Jack is sublime, and he is compelled to put SHAVING PARLOR forth the best of his powers in order to merit such faith. Larry was not born a detective, but he can show some energy in this line when circumstances compel him to adopt it. Before a great while he joins Doctor Jack and his wife. What he has to tell convinces the doctor that their suspice Larry declares he got a whiff of tobacco smoke at an open window just back of the state-room, which proves the latter place to have gentlemen occupants.

Then, again, by placing his ear close to the partition separating it from the ladies' end of the car he believes he heard the murmur of voices, and even saught a Chilian oath, perhaps, uttered when Colonel Garcia discovered the abominable blunder he made in leaving his military hat somewhere in the car. By the way, Larry has hung it just where he found it, so as to allay suspicions.

A while later he sees the porter take the hat, put it under his coat, and walk in the direction of the state-room, which fact proves conclusively that he has been in communication with the occupants. Larry pokes his head a little way out of the window, and watches to see what

He sees enough to prove it all true, for the porter, leaning out, thrusts the military hat in at another opening connected with the locked state-room. There is no longer any doubt, and they can settle upon the course to be pursued. Jack is indignant. He has hired this train at heavy expense, and no one to whom he objects has any right to ride on

So when he sees the conductor again, he follows him to the smoking compart-"A few words with you, my friend,"

The man in blue uniform looks uneasy, but takes a seat as Jack motions. Already has the latter analyzed his features-the conductor is not exactly what Larry pictured him, although Jack does not wholly fancy him. "You understand that I charter this train—that my money pay for the ser vices of every man connected with it?"

"Certainly, sir," comes the ready reply. "Ah! then tell me why you dare to carry other passengers-parties who are intensely disagreeable to me-on this very car!'

CHAPTER XXXI.

It would be difficult, indeed, to do justice to the expression that marks Doctor Jack's face when he makes this demand. Men more valiant than the Pullman conductor have felt it before, and cringed. He speaks in a low tone, but there is something in his voice, with the glance from his eyes, that emphasizes

He says he is a detective from Scotland Yard, in England, following of human nature, and how best the work his man around the world; that you have stolen a million and run away with a duchess. Night approaches—the last night they expect to spend on the road. It has been a long and exciting race from Valparaiso to New York, and rendered more than ordinarily dangerous on account of the desperate tactics adopted by their rivals. Perhaps the victory will come at last, and be all the more pleasing because it has been earned.

It is on to Pittsburg now. The iron city ought to open before them by midnight, yes, even earlier, after which begins the climb over the great Alleghenies. Those who have traveled all over the world, and just crossed the grand Rockies on a special, can see nothing of a forbidding nature in such a task. It is a mere everyday performance. Long before now Larry has discovered Lord Rackett and the doughty colonel in another car, with heads together. Probably they are discussing desperate measures that may be used as a last resort, for their case is getting down to a fine point, since New York lies at the end of this jump, and it is only a question of a few hours ere they reach that place. Up the Alleghenies they pant with two engines, climbing over heights, passing through defiles, and at length reaching he summit. Then down the slope the rush with a whiz and a roar seventy miles an hour. An accident now would annihilate them all. to rise on end, totters, and then rolls down the embankment.

The scene that ensues beggars description. Fortunately this sleeper is the only car that leaves the road-bed, else the calamity would have been much greater. A wreck at night time-who can ever forget the scene-the fearful sounds, the blazing lights from burning freight cars, the his of escaping steam, and, above all, the terrible cries of men and women half-crazed with fright or Madness is apt to rule under such cir cumstances as these-even the coolest of men often join in the demoralization. Doctor Jack can remember endeavoring to throw his arms around Avis, who appears in the aisle just at the second they leave the track-he feels the car upheave like a horse rearing upon his hind legs-then it totters, and turns over. All is medley and confusion within. Fortunately the lights go out, so that the danger from fire is lessened. They seem to roll over once or twice, and then remain stationary, as though resting in a gully.
