"Be not afraid," I said, as gently as I could, when she had recovered a "We will do thee no harm." She answered something in broken Arabic, which I did not understand, and presently, professing herself quite restored, she was escorted back the way we had come. The Bedouins. whispering among themselves, appraised the value of her rich attire of silk and gold and jewels, but as for me I was speculating what the trembling creature was and how she could have drifted there. Meanwhile Suleiman had captured the queen, who, as he privately informed me, was worth more than all the rest put together.

CHAPTER XXIV. THE INDIAN PRINCESS.

There was still much to be done and need of haste in doing it, but Suleiman's first duty was to provide for the safety of the prizes he had taken. "Ye shall come with us, ye lovely ones," he said, addressing the ladies with the grand air of a born cavalier, "and we will make you secure from the fury of man. Thy lord is far from hence, my beauteous one, and his return to thy lovely bosom is uncertain. Wherefore shouldst thou tarry here to be abased ?" "There can be no worse abasement than going with thee," she snapped. Leave us to such chances as fate may bring and get ye gone, for ye are but portionless Bedouins of the de-"Nay," answered Suleiman, more insinuatingly than ever. "We cannot leave, what has enraptured our eyes. Make thyself old and ugly, my charmer, and we will fly from thy presence. But while thou puttest the rose and lily to shame thou must blame Heaven, not us, if we refuse to go from thy a hand. Will my queen, therefore, gaged clasped their hands, turned deign to accompany us to a place of safety, where she may be guarded from harm ?"

The lady would have broken out again, but Suleiman had no more time in waste on words. "Conduct thy mistress, the queen, and her fair companion, the gem of India, whither we lead," he said, turning sharply upon Faruk. "Is there a spot of safety about this nether pit ?" "It is as my lord seeth," answered

Suleiman considered for a moment, then turned again to the ladies. "Have the lights of Amood's eyes any possessions they would fain carry with them?" he inquired, with a ccurtly smile. "Trinkets, jewels, costly robes? Methinks they must have. And we will ourselves help them to collect their riches. Ye stay here while we search.' Accordingly, although the queen declared vociferously she had no wish but to see the last of us, the ladies were consigned to the care of a strong guard, of which I was one, while the rest, under the guidance of Baruk went in search of valuables. They returned after a little with many sparkling caskets full of precious gems, loads of various stuffs of richness unsurpassed-camel's hair cloaks elaborately inwrought with gold, Indian silks of manifold dyes and patglimpse of two women, whom we had terns, Khorassan brocades, bundles of rugs and shawls and sashes enough to furnish ten regiments of sheiks, and more important than all, two more of the principal ladies of the harem." "Just one thing more ere we depart," said Suleiman, gleefully. "There is enough of the wine of Shiraz to float a thousand ships, and, by the prophet's beard, we go not without a share of skin bottles of many sizes full to the brim of wine. The burdens were set down, and Suleiman looked with joy at the pile, and from the pile to the ladies, and from the ladies back to the pile. "It is good," he remarked. "Said us following as best we could. Sud- I not that Amood was a mighty bene-said Suleiman to a man at his side "Two, if theu canst find them, and make thy best speed.' Ali and Baruk were out of sight in a moment, and Suleiman went on with his instructions. "And thou, Ibrahim, my trusty right hand, take with you three others, cleave your way down to where we left our horses, and tell our fellows to bring them under this window. The matter will be easy. Get camels, too, if thou canst lay hands on them, and our fair ones would ride the easier in litters. I will swing a lamp in the window as a signal to thee, and forget not, good Ibrahim, to make haste." "I will not forget," said Ibrahim choosing his companions. In a few minutes Ali and Baruk were back with two stout ropes, which were made fast to two spearheads, driven into the floor.

'We will slip down these quicker than the angels came down Jacob's ladder," remarked Suleiman, throwing the loose ends out of the window. Now, my good Ibrahim, do not tarry.' Ibrahim did not tarry. Even sooner, I think, than was expected by our impatient leader, there was a sound of grunting and snorting, and low voices in the darkness underneath that made "Art thou there, Ibrahim?" called Suleiman, softly.

"I am here," answered Ibrahim, in the same tone. "And four camels, by the memory of the great Saad. (A notorious Arab freebooter.) How didst thou find them, my gay one ?" "By taking their keepers unawares and sending them swiftly to the prophet's bosom," replied Ibrahim. "Malec will seethe thee in fiery brimstone for thy good deeds, Ibrahim," chuckled Suleiman. Chattels and ladies were lowered the latter not without difficulty, for bellious, but Suleiman, who was experienced and expeditious in such matters, had soon the whole four, as he expressed it, in Ibrahim's bosom below. Then slipping down ourselves and hurriedly forming a circle about our spoils we thrust and cut a way to the comparative quiet of an orchard, where the goods were loaded and the ladies provided with litters. This care was taken that they might depreciate as little as possible in value, We had not finished when dense volumes of smoke were seen ascending from the castle. "What the Bedouin leaves the flames

It was not easy to escape from that Collection. whirlpool of destruction, and keep our plunder intact. At the start we had to fight our way step by step, and at times the handling was so rough and the odds so heavy, that it seemed we respectfully s licit a continuance of the same for JOHN McDONALD & CO. must lose all we had captured. But we kept well together, and partly by strategy, partly by a free and active use of steel, we got out at last with no more serious mishap than the loss of a little blood. To that we were by this time accustomed, and it did not hurt our spirits, though one man, evidently a recent addition to the band, made much ado about a couple of broken ribs till he was laughed and bullied out of his complaints. We made straight for the desert as our safest retreat, never drawing rein till the sun was well up and we were once more alone. Then we halted to refresh ourselves with some of the good things provided by Amood Sinn. But before there was either eating or drinking Suleiman drew up the band and made a little speech. "We have with us four princesses, as beautiful as the morning and as soft is the dove," he said, making a saaam toward the litters. "We value the gifts of Heaven, and my purpose n speaking is to let it be known that, by my life, the man who layeth a procane finger on these fair ones shall die he death of a dog. Yet is there much comfort us. We shall feast, my nerry ones. Yea, eat and drink in onour of our victories. There is a weet savour already in my nostrils. Here are rivers of the wine of Shiraz, and bread baked in the ovens of Amood Heaven protect him in his adversity!'

The company applauded, and fell nerrily to eating and drinking; the nen squatted on the ground beside their horses, the women chastely withrawn in their litters and attended by the obsequious Baruk. The meal was not over when Suleiman and Ibrahim were discussing our next movement. Much was said in a low voice about pilgrims and caravans and the pecuniary value of ladies such as we happened to possess, and, though I did not hear all, yet by putting two and two together,

I understood that more robberies were n the wind. In short, the pious of the Moslem world were then making the annual pilgrimage, and we were bent on relieving them of some of their superfluous wealth. Continued on 4th Page.
