"Yes, of a kind," he said. "When I've been hunting big game, for instance, and missed at the first shot, I always took it for an omen that if I lidn't hit with the second I should have a bad time, and I took good care not to miss, I can tell you." "Oh, I don't mean things you can

"When I saw you that day in the little woman's house, I had a presentiment that you would be my wife, and ere we are." He laughed pleasantly and pressed her arm, and she thought it wiser to say no more about omens after what he Their arrival at Walcote manor was necessarily very quiet. They reached

Liverpool in the afternoon of the following day, and as soon as the baggage could be got together started for home. Lady Walcote had remained in the house by Lola's special wish-one of the results of the change in her feelings -and Lola did her utmost to follow up the kindlier letters she had written with a greeting of really affectionate warmth. But the old lady had not changed on her side, and, though resolved to act up to the promise she had made to Sir Jaffray before the marriage, she did not like the woman he had chosen and would not pretend that she did. Thus the home coming was chilled on the threshold, and Lola herself was both disappointed and irritated, and there was more of the old Ishmaelitish feeling of defiance in her manner than her husband had observed since the marriage.

With Jaffray himself his mother was all tenderness and love, but she felt the change in the position. It was the first time that he had come home from any of his wanderings when she herself had not had the first place in his thoughts. If the other woman had been Beryl, she thought, it would have been tolerable, but to give place to Lola was unbearable She staid with them for a long time while they talked to her of their travels, and she listened attentively.

"You have been a good correspondent, Jaffray - better than usual, I think." The baronet had thoughtfully made a point of writing much more frequently than he had been accustomed to write on former occasions. "The letters from you both have been most bright and interesting. You have had all mine, I suppose?" "Yes, I think so. We got the last batch at New York.' "And what is your theory of the five stringed violin enthusiast? Is he a lunatic? He has been here and was most impatient to know when you would be

"Five stringed violin?" exclaimed Sir Jaffray. "What do you mean?" "There, you haven't read my letters. I told you about him and his queer visit to Beryl." "Who is he? What is it? I must have "The foreign violin player, M. Pierre Turrian, who has a theory about vio-

"Jaffray, I think I'll go, dear. I'm dead tired," exclaimed Lola, rising the instant Lady Walcote finished. "We must have all the home news in the morning," she added, with a smile. So it had come already, she thought as she went away, with a great pang at her heart, but making no outward sign of any kind.

CHAPTER VIII. FACE TO FACE ONCE MORE. That night was one of the hardest in Lola's life, but she faced the crisis with all the strength of her most resourceful character and came out of it undaunted and determined. So great was her self mastery and so strong her powers of acting that Sir Jaffray did not detect a single symptom of the struggle which absorbed her. Through the night she lay awake, never moving, lest she should wake him and so disturb her own opportunity for thought, and perhaps arouse his suspicions that something was amiss.

There were two courses open to her. One was to tell Sir Jaffray at once the whole matter and trust to his love for her; the other was to face it out and dare the man she hated to do his worst. If the man at her side had been different, if his sense of honor and morbid fear of the suspicion of dishonor had been less acute, she would have told him all and trusted to her love to win him to cling to her through the publicity and scandal which would inevitably follow when Pierre was set at defi-

But she dared not. She knew that Sir Jaffray, with all the influences that were round him, the strong love of truth that dominated him, the capacity to suffer rather than be touched with a taint of dishouer, would put her away from him at once, and probably he would never see her

The alternative was to face the other man and dare him to do what he pleased. What would he do?

There was that scene on the Devil's rock, but there was no proof of what she had done. Besides, if there were, what did it matter? If she was to be dragged from the place to which she had climbed, what did it matter how far she fell? A little deeper would make no difference.

Need she fall at all? That was the

She knew Pierre well, had seen through and through his sordid little soul, and could count up easily enough the price that would buy him. Comfort, ease, luxury, money for his vicesthese were his ambitions, and she could satisfy him. Sir Jaffray had settled on her an ample dowry, and she could easily get more money if she wanted it. She would go through with it, face it as she had faced her troubles and fought them down, and so great was her fighting instinct that, though she knew be at stake, the excitement of the pros-

In the early hours of the morning she fell asleep, and Sir Jaffray, waking in the gray light, found her sleeping quietly and peacefully, with a slight flush tinting her cheeks such as he had seen that Sir Jaffray noticed it and was pleased. He put it down to her being at home at the manor.

"Seems to have done you good to get home, Lola," he said. "You're not the same woman you were on the boat. Where are your omens?" He smiled. "Where, indeed?" she replied, laughing back. "I'm afraid I must have been upset by the voyage. Perhaps I thought I was going to be shipwrecked. But I'll be safe here, eh?" There was more in her words than he understood.

"You ought to be if anywhere," he answered. "Even if I manage to offend the very great personages who come here?" "You won't do that. People aren't easy to take offense with Walcote." "Where's the mother-Lady Walcote? I suppose I may call her mother?" 'She's not coming down to breakfast. She's not used to our wild west early rising. Besides, she was up late. She'll be down to lunch." "Did you sit up late? I was horribly tired. I couldn't stay? What was that Seems to have done you good to ge she was saying about some ridiculous musician or other and a five stringed

"Bit of a crank, I fancy," said Sir Jaffray, laughing; "said he wanted some ret or other about a violin and that you'd been his pupil or something years ago. Turrian his name is. Do you remember him?"

Lola laughed musically and showed her white, level teeth. "What, Pierre Turrian? Oh. do tell. as our friends across the water say. 1 wish I'd stopped up to hear. Remember him? Of course. He's only a young man, fair, and would be handsome if he hadn't a curious expression on his face which I couldn't like. He's a wonderful fiddler-wonderful-a genius with more than a touch of madness, but a wonderful player." She spoke as unconcernedly as if she were discussing a servant. "Where did you know him?" "Switzerland, soon after I left the convent. He taught me singing when there was some talk about my using my voice, you know." She had told him that at one time her father had shought of putting her on the stage, but that she had refused to go-a version of the fact that was not accurateand a mere reference to this subject was generally enough to turn him from any awkward discussion.

Were you under him long? Did he know that you were thinking of that?" "No, of course not," she answered when he paused, taking her cue from his hesitation. "The thing never went far enough for that. He knew no more than that I had a voice that was to be trained, and he trained it. He is a good singer as well as player. You'll hear him in all probability. By the way, shall have to get to work and practice. Our wanderings haven't given me much time for singing." And with that she turned the subject. She had produced the impression she wished upon Sir Jaffray's mind and had further prepared the way for Pierre Turrian's coming to the house should he insist upon doing that, as she thought very likely.

But she had still to deal with Lady Walcote, and during the time she was going round the house and stables and the grounds and the conservatories with Sir Jaffray she was thinking out how best to meet his mother. She commenced with an attack from her own side, skillfully planned and She found the old lady sitting alone in the morning room, and she went up and kissed her with a show of much warmth. Then, drawing a low chair, she sat down by her. "Good morning, mother. I may call you mother?" she asked, looking into the elder woman's rather stern eyes. "Jaffray's wife can be nothing but my daughter, Lola," she answered. The girl paused and then said slowly and thoughtfully:

"I could wish that there were less di plomacy in that answer and more warmth in the tone." And she sighed. "I have never had a mother, remember." "I know very little indeed of your childhood, Lola. You have never told me anything, you know," was Lady Walcote's answer.

"It is hard to give confidence where there is no sympathy," said Lola. "As hard as to give sympathy where no confidence is offered, child." The girl sighed and raised her hand and let it fall on her lap as if with a gesture of disappointment.

I want to find love in the manor house," she said, after a pause, looking up into Lady Waloote's face, "and you offer me-this," dropping her voice, but keeping her eyes fixed steadily on PORTLAND, BOSTON, ETC. her companion's face. The old lady returned the look with one quite as steady.

"What do you mean, Lola?" "That I want to love you and you to love me, and in place of that you meet me with diplomatic answers and neatly turned retorts. Is that all the welcome you have for me? Is that what our relations are always to be? Can Jaffray bring us no nearer than that?"

It was a subtle plea and for a moment went unanswered. Then, taking the girl's hand with a more kindly action than she had yet shown, Lady Walcote said: "I, too, wish to love Jaffray's wife, Lola, but love is not a thing to be driven and constrained, and if you do not find me so warm as you wish you shall at least find me quite frank. I have been glad to have your letters and to see in them the little overtures which I thought I could detect. I thank you for your thoughtfulness, child, in urging me not to leave the manor, and I have staid, as you see, for the time, to see how we get on. It is an experiment, no more."

"Why need we doubt the result?"

"There are many reasons, but I will give you one-one that is from my side. You know that I had cherished other plans for Jaffray's marriage, that for years past it had been the strong desire of our family that Jaffray should marry his cousin, that Beryl has always been like a daughter of my own and that the project was infinitely dear to me. We old people do not easily pluck out from the heart a desire of this kind, which has struck such deep roots there as this in mine, and I have yet to see how the old manor will seem to me with another in Beryl's place."

"That is very hard for me to hear," said Lola after a long pause. "It is not meant for hardness, only to tell you frankly what I feel, so that you may know the full truth as to my feelings. Lola sighed, and, rising from her low chair, walked to the window and looked out, and there was a long silence in the

She was disappointed at Lady Walcote's attitude and began to regret that under the circumstances she had ever yielded to a gentler impulse to try to appease her by getting her to stay at the maner and so win her affection. It would be an infinite complication if she was to have this sharp, clever, suspicious old woman in the house while the trouble with Pierre was being settled, but at present her only course was to try to win her round. If way, a quarrel must be fastened on her which would drive her away. She was not long making her decision, and she went back and sat down again, close to the old lady, though not in the same chair she had sat in before. If she was to win, it would be by her wits and not by her witchery.

"If you reject my love, then," she said, "how are we to stand toward one another? You have scarcely thought what the effect of your words must be on me. You make me feel that I am something like an interloper in my husband's home and to Jaffray's mother. Is that what you mean? Do you wish me to be uncomfortable at the thought that I am not Beryl Leycester and that I did not steel my heart against your son as his mother had steeled hers against me?"

"I have not steeled my heart against you, Lola. God forbid that I should do anything so wicked. I have tried to open it to you." "And you have failed. That is even harder to bear still. I will tell you why. I have never had a woman friend in all my life except my Aunt Villyers -and the woman who is not loved by woman grows hard. Still, let it be as you will. I am no pleader for the impossible. You tell me in signs that are plainer than words that you cannot love me, and remember that it is you who have laid the foundations of what may be a wall of division between us. Remember, too, that I gave you my word I would never marry your son unless you yourself said yes. Never forget that, whatever may come, You say it is hard for the old to pluck from the heart a cherished desire. But it is harder for one like me to step out from the heaven which the love of such a man as Jaffray opened to me. Yet this I would have done had you bidden me, as I pledged you." Then, with a swift change of manner. as though carried away by one of her uncontrollable impulses, Lola threw herself on her knees at Lady Walcote's feet, seized her hand and pressed it between her own and looked with tear touched eyes into her face as she said: "Cannot our love for him and his love for us make us one, mother? Think how it would sweeten his life!" It was the shrewdest of all pleas, and, as once before it had prevailed, so now it wrought powerfully on the mother's heart. She bent and kissed Lola on the lips, her own quivering slightly. "You are right, child," she murmured. "We should be held together in his love. Forgive me if I have pained

While they were in the act of the embrace the door was opened quickly by Sir Jaffray. He stood on the threshold right well pleased with what he saw. for his great desire was that his mother and Lola should be on the closest terms. Not wishing to disturb them, he was going away without a word when Lola called him. She was quick to see the desirability of getting confirmed in his presence what Lady Walcote had said. "Come to the mother, Jaffray," she said, "and hear what we have been doing. We have just been concluding a great treaty of love and peace. Give me your hand." She laughed very softly and sweetly, while her eyes shone brightly with the light of happiness, and holding one of the mother's hands in hers and taking one of Sir Jaffray's she placed all three
