BY JOHN A. STEWART

CHAPTER I. A KINSMAN AND AN ENEMY.

After five and forty years, they tell me, turbulent students of the University of Edinburgh, I have been with envy to stories of the battles of Peter Clephane and Andrew Kilgour.

To me whose soul has been on the wrong side of the meridian, and who once rather to be engaged with his evening prayer than his morning folly, the memory of early misdeeds is no matter for satisfaction, yet I must own, it causes me no surprise to hear that our unscrupulous ruffian still lives, for if ferocity of hate could give immortality to strife ours might be forever memorable.

Jonathan and David made a covenant of love, their souls being knit together in the bonds of a mutual affection, but we swore vows of vengeance, our hearts being aflame with reciprocal ill-will.

As a consequence, hostilities were frequent and hot, and by a process as quick as it was natural we got into the very thick of the quarrel.

ings have their place and value, but to weigh them against the claims of duty is impious. Could I turn a headless ear to the call for help that comes from the distant shore, I would have no better suffer any but millation; better sacrifice freedom and my life to the cause of a traitor to whom I loved. Help? Yes, I would help. If necessary I would go to Dunde and be deaf under Peter's persecution. He would lay on and I would never so much as protest.

The gloaming came, and my landlady entered with a light. The cheerful glow of lamp and fire strengthened my resolution. My writing materials were on the table, and I sat down to my pen. I would do in all particulars according to my father's wishes. As I wrote my salty objections grew and I knew I will they were no more than a vapour shadow at the back of my mind! My pen rose, the prospect brightened. I was almost glad of the opportunity that had arisen to do something practical. I would throw myself into my new studies with the vigour of a young man. I might yet realize my father's wish, and be a legal lumina in the spirit of Times, it is a pity my father and I were not of the same family. I had read of such things; I would make my mark in the world.

My sheet was perhaps half full when all at once there arose a great shouting under my window, and I started to look out, but unable to distinguish what was said I raised the sash and thrust out my head. The moon, which was high in the sky, shone brightly, and I saw that a dozen men, dressed in similar figures, and in their midst with a leer on his face, was Peter Clephane. He broke into a tirade of railing and mockery, as he saw me, asking me how I liked my grubbing, and whether I wouldn't come down and get some of the window, firmly resolved to make no response. Words are but wind, they would not do for me. I was not by my purpose. But the clamour waxing louder and more aggressive, so that I could not write with the ease of self-possession, I put out my head again to beg them to go peacefully away, and to tell me how they volley of very ill-smelling slime and a shout of derisive laughter.

"That's a slight expression of our respect and esteem for a scabby Highland man," cried Peter. "How does it shake?"

I shook off the filth with a dizzy head and a sharp constriction of the throat, and then I withdrew. I was sick-I could not, but there was a fascination that held my eyes fast on the petty signs of vengeance. Yet I was betrayed a second time. They shouted in their glee louder than ever, and I saw that a dozen men, dressed in similar figures, and in their midst with a leer on his face, was Peter Clephane.
