DIED AT 101 :- There was laid at rest in the Roman Catholic Cemetery, Chatham, yesterday the remains of Mr. James White, uncle of Messrs. Jacob and Henry White, of Bathurst, who died at the Hotel Dieu here after an illness of a few months. He was followed to the grave by quite a large number of friends and relatives.

one very brief semi-lucid interval between the accident and his death. Haghes scarcely ever left his bedside, except for a little rest ; and his vigils were shared by a number of young men of our villige, who, it is well known, are ever ready to respond to the call of suffering and distress. ## Skating Carnival.

There was a very successful Caraival at the Crystal Skating Rink, Chatham, on Monday evening, at which nearly one hundred ladies, gentlemen and children appeared in fancy costumes, while hundreds of spectators occupied the promenade, where they sood in each other's way with a persistency which defied the prevailing cold weather and the efforts of those who would have preferred a walk around to keep up the circulation.

But he was too generous, too noble, to accept the sacrifice from her. "You shall go, my darling, and take the boy with you. I can trust you-ab, thank heaven, I can trust you! You will come back to me, and you will know then that all the world can never give you the value of my love." "I know that now," she whispered; and he was content.

She said afterwards to Mr Ford :--"It was well we kept our secret and said nothing of Lord Carlswood's condition; if he had known them, he would never have let me go.' And Mr. Ford sighed again as he said to himself :-assiduity in anticipating and ministering to "Heaven help the man who trusts his happiness to a woman's keeping!"

CHAPTER XI.

Of the parting of Paul and Ismay Waldron Mr. Ford could never endure to think. He was a strong, cool, shrewd, calculating man, but when he recalled that scene he was filled with pain. The grief of the husband's honest manly heart, the silent anguish on the handsome face, the despairing love with which he clung to wife and child-all came vividly before him. More than once the lawyer had been tempted to tell her not to go to Bralyn-more than once Ismay was tempted to clasp her arms round Paul's neck and promise never to leave friends at South Nelson, with deceased's him. He said nothing, but he looked like a man on whom sentence of death had winter's wages in full, at the same time been passed.

discharging all bills of expense, consequent He exhausted his resources in order that his wife might be nicely dressed. He had bought a dress of soft, lustrous silk, and they both thought in their simplicity that elegance could go no farther. "This great lord will see that I have taken care of you," said the young husband, half sadly, half fondly. The morning of departure came, and his white face was pitiful to see. "It is only for a visit," said Ismay, and he clasped her in his arms. "Ismay, darling, you will not let them turn your heart from me-you will not earn to love wealth and luxury so dearly that you can never love me again?" She soothed him as women know how to soothe the fears of those who love as ever passed through the hands of the them.

Mr Ford, who watched the scene, poet. But money and happiness do not thought he had never beheld a greater contrast. The husband was pale and millionaire suicided the other day because haggard, full of a great passion, a great grief-the wife was beautiful, bright, and he was tired of life, while many a tramp radiant, her loveliness enhanced by her laughs at his misfortunes and prays for tasteful dress, her smiles brighter from showed her ancient armor that had been worn by the heroes and warriors of hi race; he showed her the pictured faces of men whose voice had raled the land: he showed her the portraits of ladie whose names had been proverbial for beauty and grace.

Ismay listened without comment. In her own mind she was comparing the magnificence of everything around her with the poverty of her own little wood land home. Could she ever return and live contentedly there again? Lord Carls wood watched her in silence; he took heart from the expression of her face; he kept her purposely engaged in conver with the poverty of her own little wood sation.

"Let her forget to write to him ing this first night of her absence," h said to himself, "and I shall consider in a point gained. It will teach him what to expect, for I begin to hope and to be lieve she will not leave me.'

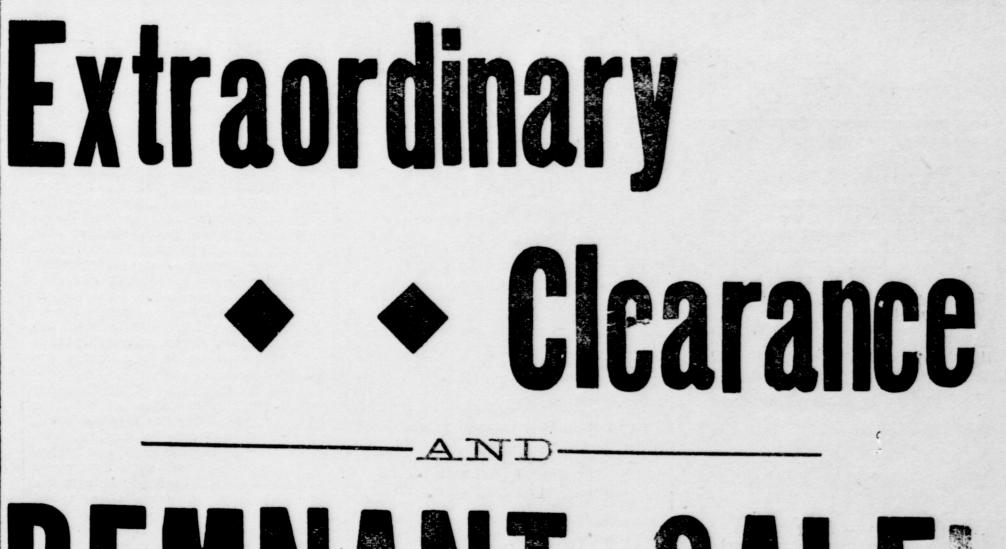

It was not until Ismay stood in her rosm at midnight that she said to her 83lf :---

"What shall I do? I have forgotten to write to Paul?"

CHAPTER XII.

A few days passed, and Ismay Waldron began to feel at home at Bralyn. She became accustomed to its splendors, its magnificence, to the new and beautiful life that opened to her. She looked back with wonder on the time that had passed-on her life in the humble cottage. How had she borne the quiet, the seclusion the absence of everything she now valued most? Lord Carlswood was most adroit in
