HAPPINESS BORN OF CONFIDENCE.

Perfect confidence between husband and wife is the firmest basis of married happiness. Whenever it is lacking you will find misunderstandings and suspicion, finally leading up to estrangement, or, in extreme cases, to separation. In nine cases out of ten the fault lies with the husband. It is easy for a woman to confide all her thoughts and feelings to the man she loves. Indeed, she is apt to overdo it. If he is a patient man he will hear from beginning to end every detail of her trials as housekeeper or as a mother to his children. And though in his heart he may wonder at the stress she lays on such trifling things, still he likes it, and would miss the daily recital if it were withheld. But with a man-"that is another story." A man lives in two separate worlds of his own. One in which he exists as the head of his family and enjoys the simple, humdrum pleasures of domestic life. The other part of his life is passed in his office or counting room at the head of his professional or business career.

He finds it a relief to throw off the atmosphere of sordid care that envelops him in the business world. He tries to forget the cares and responsibilities that await him on the morrow as he basks in the sunshine of his happy fireside. He never reflects that it all mention of business with his overcoat and hat when he enters his home at night.

"What is the use," he thinks "of introducing an element of anxiety and unrest into my happy home-life? It • is enough that I must bear the burdens of care and responsibility that tax my endurance to the utmost without shifting their weight to shoulders far weaker than my own."

Added to this consideration is the

But after all she found herself obliged to do so. Mrs. Richmond quietly persisted, and overruled all her daughter's objection. It was arranged that she should go to the ball under Lady Penryth's care, and Mrs. Richmond assured her that the dress should be forthcoming at the right time. Kilmeny only hoped that it would not cost very much. She hardly knew whether she was glad or sorry to go, and deep down in her heart felt uneasy and unhappy. She had not allowed Christopher ever. The pony on which she was riding had come to her a day or two before, with Mr. Daryl's compliments,
