

LEARNING TO DO WITHOUT.

The man who has learned to do without has taken the first step toward wealth.

In the present age of the world man's wants, and woman's too, are legion. They are numberless as the sands upon the seashore.

The fact of it, man wants almost everything he sees, and the limit is never reached because he goes right on seeing till he finishes up his life course.

Half the people in the world are engaged in fashioning, manufacturing, designing and putting upon the market for sale things which the other half spend their lives in desiring and buying.

But the man of moderate means—the man on a small salary, the mechanic, the day laborer—ought to learn, first of all things, the lesson of doing without.

Did you ever stop to think how worse than useless are so many of the articles upon which the people of your acquaintance are lavishing their hard-earned money?

Quantities of the things which are purchased because they are pretty, because they attract the eye, and because "everybody has them," are entirely superfluous, and after a short time become tiresome, and we tell ourselves how foolish we were to buy them!

Look around you over your own house, over the houses of your friends, and count up the things you see that are not in any way essential to comfort or convenience. You will be surprised at the rapid swelling of the sum total.

The more things one has in a house the more laborious housekeeping comes, and our housekeepers are nearly murdered as it is, if we credit their doleful confessions.

"But," someone may say, "you must feed the thirst for art and beauty, and it is every woman's duty to make her home just as beautiful and artistic as she possibly can."

This is all correct; but when a house is turned into a museum, of all the things under the sun which ever were the form of bed or bird, or insect, or flew through the air, or roamed the earth, or was dug out of its bowels or which swam in the sea, and you are afraid to touch anything, you must feel the thirst for art and beauty, and it is every woman's duty to make her home just as beautiful and artistic as she possibly can.

Let us have comfortable chairs and sofas, in which it will be a delight to repose, and in the knowledge that nobody's hand will be brightened if a kid Daryl "Wasn't it nice of him to ask me back after our trespassing on his grounds?"

But our friends tell us, "We mean to have a good time as we go along. And so we take no thought for the morrow. Just as it is, and still not spend on follies everything you earn. You can be just as happy with one hundred dollars as with a million."

Learn to do without. There is no necessity of buying some "pretty little thing" every time you go on the street. Save your money, and when you are sick, or disabled, or old, save that overtake you, as it surely will, unless death steps in ahead of it.

A Double Disobedience.

CHAPTER I.—Continued. "Why should that be a mistake, Kimmy? You know that I am ready, and if you do not feel exactly as I do, that will cover A sort of."

"But perhaps I do not want it to come. You thought that you concealed your feelings completely just now when I asked that question, and if you had any voice in the matter, I should never speak to Mr. Daryl again. Now I am determined to speak to him, and if that will cover A sort of."

"I see," Mr. Warrender answered meditatively. "Your eyes met, and both laughed, but Kimmy's fell before his. You think that you will bring me down to earth, but I don't think you will. Here is the place where we climbed in. Shall we go out by it or go on to the gate?"

"You promised Mr. Daryl to go out by the gate." "I believe I did. Well, I must keep my word at any cost." "Do you always do that?" he inquired, curiously.

"Always. Won't you come in when we get home, to tell mamma about our adventure?" "He nodded. He had been in love with Kimmy since she was up to her eyes in the study of the subject to induce him to remain in her society."

Ten years ago, Doctor Richmond, a struggling physician with a declining family, had been glad to receive him into his house at a moderate fee as a pupil, and finally as an assistant. Kimmy's mother had been a widow, and the young man had come into a property which he had never dreamed would be his, he had decided to give up his medical studies, and if he still required to work for his bread, he was always regarded as a son of the household, and though he was not a doctor, he was called to his new estate, "Chris' room" was kept ready for him in the Doctor's house, and he was as eagerly and affectionately received as if he had been one of the family.

It was at his suggestion that Mrs. Richmond and her children had come to spend a month in a charming cottage near his house during Doctor Richmond's unexpected absence in America. Kimmy had been called to the deathbed of an only brother. The Doctor had been thankful to have his wife and children under Christopher's care, and when he returned Mrs. Richmond, a soft, pretty, motherly woman with a gentle voice and engaging ways, looked to him for advice in everything that concerned her and her children, and he entered the room, Kimmy went to her feet, and he took a low seat at her feet.

"We have had such an adventure, mamma!" she cried, and she gave her mother a look which said, "I don't know if I should tell you, but I will." "Wasn't it nice of him to ask me back after our trespassing on his grounds?"

"What do you mean to go?" Mrs. Richmond asked doubtfully, glancing at Mr. Warrender. "I am going," Kimmy answered demurely. "I don't know if I should tell you, but I will." "Wasn't it nice of him to ask me back after our trespassing on his grounds?"
