CHOICE RECIPES.
Stuffed Rolls.—Scald one cup of milk and add two level tablespoons of butter. When lukewarm add one level teaspoonful of salt, one yeast cake dissolved in two tablespoons of lukewarm water, and one one-half cup of flour. Let it rise and add flour to knead, taking care not to use too much. Toss on a floured board, pat and roll out one-third of an inch thick. Shape into small rounds with a biscuit cutter, arrange on a buttered sheet, three-quarters of an inch apart, let rise, brush over with the white or the yolk of an egg and bake in a moderate oven. The rolls should not be allowed to rise too warm a place, as they would spread out and not keep in good shape. When ready to serve remove the tops and centers and fill with cranberry sauce, or other filling. These rolls should not be larger than would make three bites.

CHINESE ETIQUETTE.
The Russians have been making something of a study of Chinese manners and etiquette and their periodicals are reporting what has been learned. The latest number of Russekii Vjestnik says it is not surprising that the Celestials consider Europeans barbarians when they see continually what they consider bad manners and breaches of etiquette on the part of white men. The proper thing according to the Chinese notion, is diametrically opposed to the European idea. For instance, when a Chinese welcomes a visitor to his house, he does not remove his hat, if he happens to have it on. He puts his hat on if he is caught without it. The seat of honor at the table is at the left of the host. It would be considered an offence if the guest inquired about the health of the hostess, or still worse, expressed a desire to be presented to her. A Chinese takes offence if told that he looks younger than he is. The older the man the more he is respected, independently of his qualities, and, therefore, a Chinese wishes to appear older than he really is. He willingly forgives many offences, but should any one happen to tread on his foot he will refuse to accept the most humble apology. When a son dies in a Chinese family the bereaved father considers it proper to show strangers a smiling countenance no matter what his sufferings may be.

CHINESE ETIQUETTE.
The Russians have been making something of a study of Chinese manners and etiquette and their periodicals are reporting what has been learned. The latest number of Russekii Vjestnik says it is not surprising that the Celestials consider Europeans barbarians when they see continually what they consider bad manners and breaches of etiquette on the part of white men. The proper thing according to the Chinese notion, is diametrically opposed to the European idea. For instance, when a Chinese welcomes a visitor to his house, he does not remove his hat, if he happens to have it on. He puts his hat on if he is caught without it. The seat of honor at the table is at the left of the host. It would be considered an offence if the guest inquired about the health of the hostess, or still worse, expressed a desire to be presented to her. A Chinese takes offence if told that he looks younger than he is. The older the man the more he is respected, independently of his qualities, and, therefore, a Chinese wishes to appear older than he really is. He willingly forgives many offences, but should any one happen to tread on his foot he will refuse to accept the most humble apology. When a son dies in a Chinese family the bereaved father considers it proper to show strangers a smiling countenance no matter what his sufferings may be.

A PASSIVE REPENTANCE
The man laughed quietly to himself as he raised the blind of the window at his berth and lay looking out upon the fleeting moonlit country. He was sure would never catch him, he was sure of that, nor recover any part of the money that rested securely in his inside pocket at that very moment. He had made a careful study of criminology before doing this thing, and he knew that only those of a certain class, who were sure to drink to certain habits, were usually captured by the authorities. As for Mary, they might watch her forever and get no indication of his whereabouts. When the right time came he had the plan formulated, whereby they might be reunited in safety, and live out their quiet lives in such peaceful fashion as they had always dreamed of through the days of weary, hopeless struggling and unending toil. He was glad the opportunity had come for him to steal the money that by a perverted sense of the justice of things he felt was his. He now comes to the front, however, with a project so far surpassing all of his previous games that with the possible exception of the plans of the De Lesseps, it may be said to be without a parallel in latter day engineering. It is no less than to build a line of railroad from Cape Town to Cairo.

PLANS A GREAT RAILROAD.
Cecil Rhodes would connect Cape Town and Cairo by a British-Egyptian line. Mr. Cecil Rhodes, known throughout the civilized world as a speculator of stupendous ideas, has again indulged in a sort of day dream. He has sprung upon the British and South African public many startling schemes, some of which, as his bank account would doubtless show, have been surprisingly successful. He now comes to the front, however, with a project so far surpassing all of his previous games that with the possible exception of the plans of the De Lesseps, it may be said to be without a parallel in latter day engineering. It is no less than to build a line of railroad from Cape Town to Cairo.
