The birds occupy a different department of natural history all to themselves. There is nothing about a man that descended from bird life. On either side of the neck is a dormant not been for my pure blood. I told him it gill. It is a muscle standing upright and hardly perceptible. The fins are muscles on the back and sides of the body in about the same position they occupy on fishes. Men who habit the water a great deal more than others have these muscles abnormally developed. The scales of the human body, while smaller and of an epithelium extraction, are exact reproductions of the scales of the fish. In brief, my dear sir, it is claimed on high scientilic authority that your ancestors were very fishy, but science never was a great respector of delicate sensibili-
