STORIES OF THE SEA

By EDWARD JENKINS, M.P.
Author of "Little Hodge," "Lord Bantam," "Gin's Baby," &c.

"You've pocketed the key by mistake, Mr. Stillwater. Open the door and come along."
Stillwater hesitated a moment. His face became dark and menacing, and his hand with an undecided motion, sought not the pocket where he had deposited the key, but his bosom.
"Bah!" said Mr. Crog, who was watching every moment, and he threw himself with all his force upon the man and seized his arm. "You would try that on, would you?" He shouted, "Engineers there—help!"

A terrific struggle ensued within the narrow limits of the cabin. Stillwater, surprised for an instant by Mr. Crog's unexpected promptness, recovered himself with the resourceful readiness of a man accustomed to situations of danger, and well trained in all the arts of defence. He soon shook off the Crog's grasp upon his arm, and closing with him, threw him on his back upon the floor, with his head against the sofa, which ran along the side of the cabin, and which left the port steward at his mercy. In the scuffle a revolver had dropped from the valet's breast, and fell into the hands of Mr. Crog at the moment, it was lying under him, to his great discomfort, so that his foe was unable to recover it. Meanwhile the second cabin steward, who had been silent, men were already knocking at the door. As Stillwater, kneeling on the breast of the prostrate Crog, was striving to get his powerful hands fairly fixed on his neck, an effort which Crog resisted as well as he could in his awkward position, two or three sturdy engineers, applying their shoulders to the slight panel which constituted the door, burst it in, with its fastenings, and they and the second cabin steward, together upon Mr. Stillwater and his intended victim.

The so-called valet displayed immense strength, and the blood which was afterwards found scattered on the white French panel showed how terrific was the struggle that ensued. But weight and number were his allies, and about five or six minutes, Mr. Stillwater, with his hands artistically tied behind him in a way known only to sailors, his face blue and his clothes nearly torn off his back, was seated on the sofa, facing several panting men, who were waiting for the dress gauge proof of the prisoner's desperate force and energy.

Mr. Crog, more breathless and discomfited than the rest, than he sat upon the edge of the lower berth, with one eye artistically closed and coloured, his side face covered with blood from a scalp wound, and his general appearance, as a cabin steward by no means as trim and taut as the ship's regulations required. He was intently studying with the greatest attention upon the edge of the lower berth, with one eye artistically closed and coloured, his side face covered with blood from a scalp wound, and his general appearance, as a cabin steward by no means as trim and taut as the ship's regulations required.
