

APETITES OF ROYALTY. WHAT KINGS AND QUEENS OF THE WORLD LIKE TO EAT.

Victoria, a vegetarian, Wilhelm of Prussia, a meat-eater, and the Emperor of Russia, a strong drinker.

Some sovereigns, ignoring their royal prerogative of being able to do without food, are very particular in their choice of diet.

Probably the Prince of Wales is the most accomplished student of gastronomy—the most talented "diner out"—of all the representatives of modern royal houses.

For some years she has even abstained from participation in the yearly banquet, which the English royal household regards with almost sacred reverence—the Christmas dinner.

As everybody knows, the three traditional pieces of resistance of this roast are the side of an ox, roasted whole; a boar's head, and a mammoth woodcock pie.

The Kaiser, who prides himself upon his good taste in a great many matters, prefers feathered game to all other kinds of food, and affects a special fondness for salmon, or stew, made of thrushes.

Another queen who affects plainly cooked, rather underdone meats is Christina, Regent of Spain. The Queen mother eats roast beef, not because she likes it, but because court physicians insist upon it as a regular diet.

His ENORMOUS MUSTACHE, which had to be rearranged by his barber, is the most striking feature of the Emperor of Russia.

His Physical Development is Attended to in the Army Gymnasiums. Tommy Atkins—more than to say, the typical British soldier.

There are fields of labor for out-door work and for parades, and there is an enormous outdoor framework for climbing and swinging.

Parson Rusden's Fight

The Reverend Michael Rusden, curate of Rodesley, was sketching busily. After working hard for over an hour, he looked at the result of his labour.

There could be no doubt as to his having one, inasmuch as the trees were depicted in the best natural and autumnal tints portrayed in vivid crimson, the fields were brilliant green.

The Reverend Michael Rusden was no fool. He was a good scholar, a fair preacher, and a diligent minister.

A Danger Signal.

Just as the lighthouse is a signal of danger to sailors, and the red light to railway men, so has nature equipped individuals with danger signals.

slight at first—which indicates that your condition is not a healthy one. If the danger signal is not heeded, serious results will follow.
