"He's late again," she said aloud, womanly touches her wistful fingers had given them. She had wrested the horror of hotel rooms from them against heavy odds. And how the children had helped! Jed's horse, over there in the corner, Nell's sorry doll on the couch, the Tiny One's rubber dogs and cats everywhere,bless them, how they helped !

Honoria Keller had been married eight years and she had never had a home. From one hotel or boardinghouse to another they had drifted restlessly. The children had been born in hotels-that was Honoria's the children a great wrong. When Harry laughed at her the hurt deepened and widened. It was all Harry's doings, anyway. When they had money enough, he said, in his

Time enough. Suddenly the woman pacing the bright little room uttered a sharp sound of pain. The old wound would not bear opening. She hurried to her usual refuge, the children in their beds. Their little flushed, reaceful faces always calmed her. "You don't lay it up, do you?" the mother sobbed softly. "You know mother wanted to give you a home to be born in,-Jed, Nell, Tiny One! You don't lay it up?" For a little while she sat beside then, in the darkened room, touching their little cheeks in turn, with soft mother kisses that never waken. Then, comforted, she went back again to the light. But the evening wore on, dragged on, without the sound of familiar steps outside the door. Somewhere a clock chimed 10, then 11, then 12. "It was 12 last night," she said, and waited. Then 1 o'clock rang out in clear note. "It was 1 the day before yesterday," Honoria said. They had parted in bitter anger in the morning, but that was too familiar a thing to count. Lately the partings had all been angry or coolly indifferent. When had they kissed each other good-bye in the morning? Honoria caught her breath in sharp distress. "At home we would - it would be different if we had a home!" she cried out a little wildly, "How can we love each other this way, without a home?" The great house settled into quiet.

Somewhere, a great way off, doors shut with a final clang, and loud keys creaked in their locks. "He will not come to-night," Honoria said. note from him. "Have gone away. You will not be sorry. It has been liked to have kissed the children good-by. Harry."
