International Argument

There is one State of Maine Yankee who ull hereafter reserve the expression of his opinions of England and the English for the safer climate of home.

He stood in a hotel bar in St. John yesterday morning and made several remarks. They were vigorous, decidedly uncomplimentary and ungentleinanty. Some of his friends tried soothing means, but the map from Maine was out for blood-British | blood.

He didn't get any. There was present at the time a mayor of a New Brunswick town, who is not a very big man, while the tacker towered up about six feet. But the mayor didn't approve of either the sentiments or the language, so he walked over and said "See here-you're cou-i lerable bigger than me, but that kind of talk don't go down here. This is where you get poked good and hard." And his fist shot out and landed fair where the talk was coming from.
