CHAPTER VII.

When they reached the mouth of the river they found the long boat lying alongside the huge shelling rock used as a landing station on account of its convenience during all varieties of tide.

The man watching there had heard or seen nothing of Mr. Trist or Admiral Wylie. The ladies sat for some time in the stern of the gig, wrapped in their waterproof cloaks, begging to speak. Then Brenda begged to be landed. She was shivering with cold and anxiety.

"Where is Mrs. Wylie?" he asked. "She is at the mouth of the river," replied Brenda — "in the boat, waiting."

"Come away!" he shouted, beckoning with his hand, and they moved through the pine wood further inland. Then he took her hand in his, and looked down into her face with unlooked-upon scrutiny.

"The nearest village," he began in his meek way, "is Fjaerholm; we shall be there by a fair breeze, there is a church there and a churchyard, although the village itself is a tiny place, almost surrounded by glaciers, and rarely visited, it will hardly be worth the approach of a boat, yet, but if you can find out where we leave the Heimdaljordfjord, it will simplify matters. Whether, I mean, we are to make for Fjaerholm, or to view of burying him there, or to go down to Sognjord, catch a steamer to Bergen, and go home."

"I am afraid, Brenda," he said apologetically, "that I am rather hard and practical in these matters. My opinion is that Fjaerholm churchyard is as good a place as any, it would be a horrible journey home for her and . . . for you."

"I am sure it will be better," he said. "I am sure it will be better for her and . . . for you."
