To-day wind and signalize the forth-coming of we return to the general topic with no each new tome by an in-very-manyword of apology to our readers. We had rather say that the revival of the subject is a joy to us. It partakes of th gleefulness of the game chase, notwithstanding that the prey is a mean one for, mean as it is, it yet is significant by the viciousness, and might reasonably excite the soberist of mankind to its extermination. The hunted, we need not say, is that impious and devastating malefactor known as "the bad author." What then is our object, and what the end in view. Our purpose is to aid in extirpating the vice of the age namely the reading of bad books. The ultimatum to which our endeavors tend, is the preservation or redeeming of the morals of men. These are broad statements; but they are in no wise presumpuous. It is almost impossible for any deep and well-thinking person to regard without dismay the head-long drift of modern idea to error on the prepounding of new theories, or, in other words, to regard the diversity of opinion,-religious, political, or otherwise .- and the paltable absurdity of many of them that obtain amongst the various nations or classes in the nations at the present day. Demagogues tell us that we live in an era more prolific of men of erudition than any other from the beginning of the world: that the press is the great engine which is raising the mind to its highest developements, which stores it with intellectual fire; and that books are the invaluable means whereby it nourishes the flame. Upon the first statement opinions are variform; but upon the last the conviction of every observing man is settled for a certainity. Books and the printing press, the production 6 and the producer, are both, doubtless, a most useful invention of genius. They have proved the greatest auxiliaries to civilization; they have ministered beyond calculation to the enlightenment of the race; and have, in a word, opened the great treasures of science to every intelligent people. Nevertheless with all these transcendant advantages coming down to the nations and growour most important industries will be ing in power with the generations, what is the status of mankind to-day? There is no disguising the fact: it is a state of skepticism.
