Captain Tyson, commander of the Howgate polar expedition, and formerly one of the United States steamer Polaris party to the Arctic regions, delivered a very entertaining lecture in Baltimore on "One hundred and ninety-six days on an ice-floe." As an introduction, Captain Tyson referred to the progress of the Polaris expedition in 1871, the death of Captain Hall, its commander, in August, 1872, and the subsequent start of the vessel homeward in command of the sailing-master. Toward the middle of October of that year, as the winter season was about commencing, the ship's company built an icehouse on a floe, as a precaution in the event of the vessel being disabled by the ice in which it was bound. October 15th a gale and snowstorm set in, and while the speaker was at supper an alarm was given that the ice was breaking and the ship had been stove in. In the confusion which followed a large quantity of ship's stores were cast over on the ice. The alarm in regard to the vessel's safety having proved false, Captain Tyson, with a number of volunteers, went on the ice for the purpose of saving the provisions. While thus engaged the ice broke, and the vessel parted from her moorings and was swept away. She was not to be seen at daybreak the day following, and Captain Tyson, being the only officer among the fugitives, found himself in jackets. command of the party, consisting of Mr. Myers, of the scientific corps, the ship's steward, cook, seven seamen, Esquimaux | ese stuff Joe, his wife and little son, and Esquimaux Hans, his wife and four children a total of nineteen persons, including five children. During the 16th of October, while endeavoring to perform the hopeless feat of making a boat voyage to land, the Polaris was seen about six miles to the stern, apparently sailing and steaming toward the floe. Signals were hoisted, but the ship was subsequently observed anchored on the lee of an island. The floe drifted rapidly to the southward, and the Polaris was finally lost to sight, leaving the party without said, be the only wear for full dress this

Do not use the eyes for such purposes by any artificial light. Avoid the special use of the eyes in the morning before breakfast. Rest them for half a minute or so while reading or sewing, or looking at small objects, and by looking at things at a distance, or up to the sky; relief is immediately felt by so doing. Never pick up any collected matter from the eyelashes or corners of the eyes with the finger nail; rather moisten it with saliva and rub it away with the ball of the finger. Frequently pass the ball of the finger over the closed eyelid toward the nose; this carries off any excess of water into the nose itself by means of the little canal which leads into the nostril from each inner corner of the eye, the canal having a tendency to close up in consequence of the slight inflammation which attends weakness of eyes.
