HOW JOHN PAID FOR HIS FARM.

"No, I thank you," said John, "I never drink." It was in a saloon in the Third Ward of New York, where the Democratic club had their headquarters in the fall campaign of 1848, when Gen. Lewis Cass, Martin Van Buren, and General Zachary Taylor were candidates for President of the United States, that I heard the above remark. The words were spoken in a firm, decisive manner. I had never heard such words used before at the headquarters, and so I looked at the speaker to see what kind of a person he could be. He was a young man, and would probably cast his first vote at the coming election. My Democratic friend who had invited John to drink was evidently taken aback at the answer, but, wily politician that he was, said:

"All right, young man, then take a cigar with me." "No, I thank you," again said John, in as decisive a manner as before, "I never smoke."

If John's first answer was a puzzler, his second answer was still more bewildering, and my Democratic friend looked around at his fellow-politician in amazement. Could the young man before him be a Democrat, or was he a spy from the Whig camp, trying to find out the plans of the Democratic campaign? But John was a loyal Democrat, marched regularly in the Democratic torchlight processions, and gave his first vote for General Lewis Cass, of Michigan. As we were waiting for the returns the evening of election day, John said to me, "What a terrible place a New York saloon is to tempt young men on to destruction! See those young men around the bar at the other end of this hall. Three months ago, when they joined our club, they would only take a cigar when invited to drink; now they will take whiskey and brandy like old toppers; not one of them will leave here to-night without a strong smell of alcohol fire upon them. I am the only young man of the club unsmirged by that fire, and I should not have escaped if I had not looked up to Him to keep me, who kept the three Israelitish youths safely in the fiery furnace of Babylon's king. I will never join another political club that has its headquarters in a liquor-saloon. You will never meet me here again after tonight."

And I never did. He had selected another place to spend his winter evenings; I was in Beekman Street, near Nassau. The building standing there at that time was called Clinton Hall, and it contained the Mercantile Library and Reading-room. That is nearly forty-three years ago. More than a generation has passed away. Last fall, as I was riding in the cars on one of the railroads in the central part of the Empire State, I saw a man whose face attracted my attention. "I have seen that face before," I thought to myself. "Yes, it must be I am right. Forty-three years have made great changes in his appearance, his hair and whiskers are almost as white as the frosts of autumn, but yet that is John." Having come to this decision in my own mind it was not long before I determined to see if my conclusions were correct, and so, approaching the gentleman, I said: "Please excuse me, sir, but is not your name John—, and did we not meet each other at the Democratic headquarters of the Third Ward of New York in the fall of 1848?"

He looked at me searchingly for a few moments, and then the expressions of doubt on his face changed to that of friendly recognition as he answered: "Yes sir that is my name, and your name, and your name is—. I remember the time and place you refer to perfectly well." After an hour so spent in pleasant review of the events of the past, I said: "Where do you live, and what is your occupation now?" He answered: "I live on my liquor and tobacco farm; it is situated but a short distance from the next station. You have time to stop and take dinner with me, and have a look at my farm. You can take the 3 P. M. train, and arrive in Utica in time to take tea with your friend there."

I did not like the ugly-sounding name he gave his farm, was my friend, whose manly refusal to drink intoxicating liquor when he was a young man, had attracted my attention to him—was he, now that his hair had become white by the frosts of nearly three-score years, engaged in raising tobacco and making whiskey? I wished to know the facts, and so accepted his invitation. As we entered the house the motto on the opposite side of the room greeted us with, "You are welcome!" while over the clock, which stood on the mantel-shelf, was the motto, "God bless our home." I was glad to see that John had not forgotten to return thanks to Him "who bestows upon us every good and perfect gift," and sends us the early and the latter rain." (To be continued)

A match-cutting machine is quite an automatic curiosity. It cuts 10,000,000 a day, and then arranges them over a vat, where the heads are put on at a surprising rate of speed.

COOK'S ANODYNE LINIMENT.

Train to Run 150 Miles an Hour.

A novel and somewhat wonderful proposition has been made by Mr. Behr, who is seeking power from parliament to construct an express passenger line upon an entirely new system from Liverpool to Manchester, and claims that by his invention a speed of from 120 to 150 miles an hour can be attained. The proposed line is a single-rail one and a specimen of it is now to be seen working between Listowel and Ballybrenide in Ireland, though the power being steam the speed is quite slow. In experiments at Brussels last year Mr Behr proved that a car could be run on a single elevated rail up to ninety miles an hour, could go round curves of short radius with perfect safety, and could under no circumstances leave the rails. The power was electricity supplied by a cable, and the car contained its own motors, picking up the current as it went along. The main single line was placed on trestles were supplementary rails, on which the guide wheels engaged. Many serious accidents have occurred on the Listowel and Ballybrenide line, and each has but served to show that it is absolutely impossible for a train on the single-rails system to be thrown off the metals. Mr. Behr wants to build a lightning express line between Liverpool and Manchester to convince the railway companies that best policy would be not to oppose his ideas, but to construct alongside their trunk lines a mono-rail or express passenger only. Mr. Behr claims to have carefully worked out his scheme for such an express line alongside and in connection with the present railway systems.

Farm Cleanings.

A few years ago farming required brawn, now it requires skill. Then we ploughed, put in the seed and harvested the crop by main strength now we do it with machinery, and the man who is most skillful in the use of that machinery gets the largest yield.

Though a barn may have been constructed improperly in the beginning, one can by careful changes, remodel same and make it quite convenient. Again we can take almost any old building and if it contains sufficient room, remodel it and make it a convenient and comfortable barn.

The time is fast approaching when the old style of plank floor in the cow barns is going to be supplemented with a cement one. Not so. The ambitious, progressive, scientific farmer is prospering to day and has no time to complain.

A good growth of the first year of a colt's life costs less than at any other age, and is twice as valuable to the breeder. It is a great deal easier and cheaper to put two years growth on a colt in the first year of its age than it is to make up for a year's loss of growth in two or three years. Many farmers complain that they cannot breed the large-size horses desired, while they make the mistake of not feeding and caring for the colt properly from the start. Young colts should be encouraged to eat, and should be given plenty of milk and ground feed to cause rapid growth, as the English and French farmers do. "Spare the feed and spoil the colt" is true in every case.

An eloquent Detroit preacher tells this among his early experiences in a rural parish. One of his parishoners was very ill and finally sent for the minister, who found the man rather reticent and finally asked if there was anything he could do. "Parson," was the answer, "sleep would make me well, but the doctor can't make me sleep. I wondered if you'd preach me the long sermon I heard last July."
