

THE QUEEN'S VISIT TO PARIS.

The reception which Her Majesty received at Paris seems to be more enthusiastic if possible, than that of Napoleon and the Empress in London. The following will give the reader some idea of it.

PROGRESS THROUGH PARIS.

Those who do not know Paris will have some difficulty in realizing the splendid aspect of the line of Boulevards with the bright sunlight pouring down from the sky without a cloud, the pavements and carriage-way swarming with people, the lofty houses with the jalousied window thrown open and filled with spectators, the extensive ranges of balconies all occupied, and in every direction that indescribable air of excitement manifest which marks the anticipation of a great public event.—The troops, to the number, it is said, of 100,000 men, half of the line and half of the National Guard, took up their positions, about four o'clock, on this immense and splendid route. The former held the left side of the thoroughfare, and the latter the right, while, penned in behind them, the myriads of spectators gradually settled into their places and waited patiently for the arrival of the illustrious strangers. The prefect of police set down the number of people assembled at 800,000, and, considering the vast accession made within the last few days to the population of Paris, it did not probably fall much short of that mighty aggregate.

At a quarter past seven the dull booming of the royal salute began, and instantly a hoarse roar of satisfaction swelled along the line of the Boulevard. The salute of 21 guns for the Queen had hardly died away when that of 101 guns for the Emperor commenced, and this in its turn had scarcely ceased when the cortege was sweeping on its way.

The progress through Paris was beyond doubt the most remarkable event of the kind since the entrance of the Allied Sovereigns to Paris. Her Majesty was evidently deeply impressed with the scene which everywhere presented itself, any attempt adequately to describe which must fail.—No pen could scarcely realize the grandeur of the people's welcome, which, from the railway station to the Arc de Triomphe, awaited her Majesty.—The streets were lined with military throughout. Every window was filled with elegantly-dressed women—even the house-tops, were crowded—and on either side the road dense masses of the populace, who had waited patiently for hours, raised their united voices in shouts of welcome as her Majesty rode along.

RECEPTION BY THE EMPRESS.

The Queen was received on her arrival at St. Cloud by the Empress. Her Imperial Majesty stood at the foot of the stair-case, accompanied by her Imperial Highness Madam the Princess Mathilde, and the ladies and officers-in-waiting of the Emperor and Empress, as also by the Marshals of the palace, by the ladies and officers appointed to wait on her Majesty the Queen of England during her sojourn, by their excellencies the great officers of the Crown, by his excellency the Minister of State and the Emperor's household, and by his Excellency the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Immediately ascending to the grand apartments the Emperor presented to her Majesty the Queen, the Ministers, the great officers and the officers of his household. At half-past nine their Majesties entered the Diana Gallery, where dinner was served. Their Majesties afterwards returned to the state apartments, where they remained till eleven.

SUNDAY AT ST. CLOUD.

Her Majesty did not, according to understood arrangements, go to Paris on Sunday morning from St. Cloud, for the purpose of attending divine service at the British embassy. Private service was performed in one of the halls on the ground floor, and was attended by her Majesty, Prince Albert, the Prince and Princess, with the royal suite, and about ten other persons. The service, which commenced at eleven o'clock, was performed by the Rev. Dr. Hale, chaplain to the British Embassy.

HER MAJESTY'S VISIT TO THE EXHIBITION.

Her Majesty and the royal suite left St. Cloud between ten and eleven o'clock. There were then carriages of state, besides a very beautiful private carriage belonging to the Emperor. A large crowd was collected to greet her Majesty on her arrival, and this time it was done with some effect. No falling off is perceptible in the welcome which her Majesty everywhere receives. As soon as she entered the building the cheering was immense, and hands struck up "God save the Queen." Her Majesty appeared much interested in the exhibition, but when she came to the English department, a loud and a long cheer was given, which must have found its way so the very core of her heart. Every individual voice was affected tion's own, and the mass was a torrent which her Majesty is far too sensitive not to have felt and appreciated.
