Break down fell Superstition's wall, Which long has held them in its thrall, And plant Religion there.

But tales of horror most profound, The ears and hearts of all t' astound, Have reached us from afar; Horrors before whose hellish tales, The bloodiest page of history pales, Of rape, sack, murder, war.

Heartrending are the shrieks that rise In orient realms, 'neath summer skies-Bright children of the sun;

From India's wide prolific fields Which nature's choicest products yield, Where Ganges' waters run.

Thence comes the sound of woe, for there Hath mutiny its arm laid bare, In bloodiest, direst mood ; There bid its dusky myriads strew-Sepoy, Mahomedan, Hindoo.

Their land with Christian blood ! Too well, alas! those fiends of hell

Have done their mission ; all too well Their hell-born rage inclined ; Nor woman's loveliness could stay, Nor infant innocence allay Their blood-pursuing mind.

Long, long shall those events in India fill The thoughts, and cause a sympathetic thrill For those poor sefferers on that distant shore, At Delhi, Lucknow, Agra, and Cawnpore; While execrated to eternal shame Shall live that murd'rous Nena Sahib's name. And long-yea, while true valor can command A generous feeling, shall the praises flow Of those true heroes of each gallant band Who quelled the rising, laid the wretches low Long foremost on Britannia's scroll of fame Shall proudly stand our Havelock's cherished name!

As every maiden says she d orter-Has chosen to herself a mate-The Prince of Prussia-and in state The wedding will quite soon take place; That she, with all Victoria's grace-Her true and noble woman's heart, Without dissembling, pride or art-May be possessed, I humbly pray,

But stop ! my muse, no further stray, For homespun matters ask thy lay; And pleasant is the duty due, To sing of home and country too.
