next intelligence confirmed the statement that the Russians and Austrians had united their forces and interests, and that, united, they were carrying the war into the heart of France. However, we may consider the surmise as unlikely. Still, it is not by any means impossible. Russia, lusting for power and for revenge upon her former enemies, might be willing to sympathise with Austria, to reach those ends; and, failing to secure an alliance with France, might feel a renewed hostility toward that country. The plot deepens and darkens, and the mind, endeavoring to form correct conjectures wicker says: from the aspect of affairs, becomes bewildered and involved in the pending struggle.

By our latest advices it will be seen that the rumors above alluded to are not confirmed, as likewise that the star of Austria still seems to wane, and success to perch upon the banners of the seems highly satisfactory.
