LABOR. Despise not labor! God did not despise The handicraft which wrought this gorgeous globe, That crowned its glorious with yon jeweled skies. And clad the earth in nature's queenly robe. He dug the first canal—the river's bed-Built the first fountain in the gushing spring, Wove the first carpet for man's haughty tread,

He made the pictures painters imitate; The statuary's first grand model made, Taught human intellect to recreate, And human ingenuity its trade. Ere great Daguerre bad harnessed up the sun Apprenticeship at his new art to serve, A greater Artist greater things had done, The wondrous pictures of the optic nerve. There is no deed of honest labor born.

That is not godlike in the toiling limb,

The warp and woof of his first covering.

Howe'er the lazy scoff, the brainless scorn. God labored first; toil likens us to him. Ashamed of work ! mechanic with the tools ? The tree thy axe cut from its native sod. And turns to useful things-go tell to fools-Was fashioned in the factory of God. Go build your ships, go raise your lofty dome,

Your granite temple that through Time endures. Your humble cot or that proud pile of Rome-His arm has toiled there in advance of peers, He made the flowers your learned florists scan, And crystalized the atoms of each gem, Ennobled labor in great Fature's plan, And made it virtue's brightest diadem.
