SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1859.

Capital Punishment, constituted like theirs are not therefore suited to the County. our times, when far from exercising a salutary inhaps to do without the operation of revenge. During the period of their wanderings in the wilderness, of the anarchy and confusion, alter nately prevailing-which preceded their kings, and during the bloody series of treasons, successful rebellions, civil wars and foreign invasions, which followed the first assumption of the royal dignity, and ceased not until the final destruction of the nation, under those awful circumstances so often foretold, -imprisonment for life, or even for a term of years, would have been inconvenient or insecure. Nor would the prisoners, as among civilized people, have inspired the beholders with a wholesome terror. There was no fit substitute for capital punishments, and they were resorted to as a necessity. But because a peculiar people, under most peculiar circumstances, by a command of Heaven as express as any of the express and personal commands recorded in the Bible, punished certain crimes with death, shall we, under circumstances not parallel with theirs, without divine warrant, violate that great command which is not only contained in the Mosaic code of laws, but is re-enancted and enforced upon us in the most impressive manner in the New Testament,-a command universal in its obligations,-"Thou shalt not kill." There can be no excuse the application of the above to all but the one soli | meditated and deliberate murder, or of having any tary case of murder. The right of society to take knowledge of the fact. The whole object seems to be the inculcation of the sanctity of human life; and God says He will call to strict account the man who shall destroy the life of his brother.
