Editorial Correspondence.

Boston, Oct. 23, 1860. The Prince is gone, and the intense excitement consequent upon his visit having subsided opportunity is afforded the stranger of looking round, and seeing the sights for which Boston is so justly famous. These are numerous, and the curious may spend days in visiting to their profit and delight the institutions, industrial, benevolent and civic, which abound. A mere reference to some of these may serve as a guide to such of our readers as may purpose visiting the city, and would wish to spend their time to the best advantage, and most economically, in visiting the most note-worthy. If the visitor is an entire stranger, and has no friend to act as his cicerone, his first care, after being installed or any where else, as it may be convenient. We shall now mention the institutions and points of interest as they occur to us. Every evening there opon, in the way of theatres, &c., as well as public lectures; but the taste of the individual will direct his steps in this connection. The Common is the pride of Bostonians, as it is the glory of the city. Situated in the heart of the city, within two minntes walk of State Street, it presents an oasis in lawns, and waving forest trees, invite to rest and consider the appointment a very judicious one.

The Boston Library, on Bowdoin Square, should be visited. Here will be found an institution munificently endowed, offering to the citizens, free, a selection from an immense catalogue of books, selected discriminately, yet freely, from the productions of the best authors.

The Museum should be visited. Here are assembled specimens of the common, the curious and the House. When will the Union be dissolved? rare, from the productions of earth, air and ocean. Over a million of articles are here exhibited, comprising mummies from Egypt, the remains of men reflections they produce; mammoth skeletons; costumes of various savage and civilized nations; birds,

A visit to this institution must have a moralizing effect. Here the story of misdirected talent and prostituted intelect; of overruling passion and unrestrained lust is written in living characters; for while of course many of the criminals confined are evidently of the lowest stamp of intellect, others, again, in their heads and on their forms give painful assurance that the papers they patronise. they were made and endowed for higher and worthier

Among the many benevolent institutions which individual charity or municipal endowment have essablished in Boston, there is none more worthy in its character, or interesting in its operations, than the institution for the blind, at South Boston. Here hundreds of unfortunates, deprived of that inestimable blessing, eye.sight, are taught to enjoy life themselves, and to assist in improving and blessing others, through the development of their talents. Here the blind may be heard reading from books. printed with raised letters, fluently and easily from the touch of the finger. Vocal and instrumental music are here taught the scholar, and engaged in by them most joyfully. Fancy work of various kinds is prepared, too, in a style which compares favorably with that produced by those having perfeet all tue senses; indeed, it is a matter of the the visitor is impressed feelingly with a sense of the in the room over the office of this paper, for the purspirit of philanthropy and humanity which prompts commends itself and no doubt there will be a large the establishment of institutions like this to ame- meeting.
