But he persevered, cut through the entanglement, and on being hauled up received from the passengers and captain some well-earned gratuities. The passengers and crew expected every moment the ship would founder.

MURDER AT PRESTON .- The Barracks at Fulwood, in the death of the Colonel and the Adjutant of the 32nd Regiment stationed there. A private, named M'Cafferay, a native of Preston, had been sentenced for some trifling breach of military duty to a fortnight's confinement within the barracks, and, influenced by a feeling of revenge, he proceeded to his own room, loaded his rifle, and, taking deliberate Crofton, struck them both so effectually that their wounds proved mortal very speedily. The murderer has since declared that he did not intend to injure Colonel Crofton, but the ball, nevertheless, passed through his left side, entered one of his lungs, and coming out at the right side, struck the Adjutant's left arm, and lodged in his spine. An event like this caused, of course, a great sensation, The offender was immediately secured, and medical assistance obtained, but nothing could save the lives of the Colonel and Adjutant-both very much respected, the higher officer being cousin to the Earl of Dimsdale. A coroner's jury has since investigated the circumstance, and a verdict of "Wilful murder" has consigned M'Cafferay to the county jail, where he will remain till his trial takes place at NITURE and MIRRORS, which will be sold at Southern
