Our own great Duke never thought of himself while battling for his country and for mankind. He had to endure detraction, obloquy, opposition of the most galling kind from the very Government whose honor he was sustaining in a foreign land. His plans were traversed, his triumphs frittered away or wholly denied his means crippled, the faith which he had a right to believe would be kept with him by the home authorities, on whose administration the very existence of his army depended, was shamefully broken; and where Garibaldi meets with nothing but honor and sympathy, Wellington met with nothing but reproach and ingratitude; yet he never parted with the changing at home from month to month, and how- felt in the community in which he lived. ever strong his attachment to any one form of gavernment might have been, he felt and he acted as if his duty to his country was paramount to even his own private views and principles of government These are the men whom Garibaldi should take as his model, and not the fiery red counsellors who are urging him on to steps that may be alike fatal to his fame and to his country.
