THE MYSTERIOUS ATTACK.

BY EMERSON BENNETT.

In a recent conversation with a gentleman, who still makes his home in the West, he gave us the following thrilling narration of some of his own experience during the Kansas troubles:

"I was one of the earliest settlers in the territory of Kansas," he said; "and at the time the sanguinary conflict broke out between the two factions, I was living very quietly and peacefully upon a pleasant farm, which I had succeeded in bringing into a state of excellent cultivation. My family consisted of myself, wife, three small children, and a hired man; and as I had never taken any part in politics, and never intended to, I believed I had made no enemies and I had no fear of making any so long as it should depend upon my free will to take part on either side of what I considered a deplorable contest. Unfortunately, however, my neutrality soon brought me under the suspicious censure of both factions, each of whom affected to believe me secretly inclined in favor of the other; and I was often interrogated by neighbors and strangers, as to my political views, and whether I desired to live under pro-slavery or anti-slavery laws. I had one uniform answer for all, which was simply this:

"Gentlemen, I am no partisan, and do not believe in strife. I came here before any agitating question was started, hoping to spend a peaceful life in honest toil, intending to obey like a good citizen whatever laws then governed, or might subsequently be enacted by the will of the people."

"But how was I going to vote?" would usually next be asked.

"Just according to my conscience and judgment."

"These answers generally failed to satisfy my interrogators, who, after advancing all the strongest argument on their side of the question, would depart and report me a firm adherent of the other. So long as I was not personally molested, however, I cared little for their opinions, and kept steadily at my regular business, allowing them to think and say what they pleased of me. I took the precaution, though, to carry a loaded revolver about with me, and to keep my double-barrelled rifle, which I left at the house, ready for instant use.

"The excitement had reached its height; civil war had begun; little battles had been fought; towns had been taken and retaken; men had been murdered on both sides; houses plundered and burned—cattle stolen—women outraged; bands of robbers and assassins were traversing the country and leaving desolation and mourning in their steps; and yet, so far, no hand had been lifted against me or mine. But I was not always to escape, as the sequel too fully proved.

"One dark, cold, stormy autumn night, as I was reading a chapter in the Bible, preparatory to retiring to rest, we were all startled by a quick, heavy knocking at the door, and the demand of several gruff voices for instant admittance. I had prepared myself against just such a surprise, by making my outer doors thick and strong, and securing them with heavy bars, and by having bullet-proof shutters at the windows also, and so, telling my family not to be alarmed, I went to the door, and asked who was there and what was wanted.

"We want you to open the door, you scoundrel, before we break it open!" returned a loud, harsh voice.

"We're after a fellow by the name of Smith, that we know has secreted himself inside," said another, before I had time to reply.

"Down with the door! don't stop to parley! break it open!" shouted the voice of a third, and at the same moment there was a quick rush against it followed by heavy blows, as if from the end of a stick of timber being used as a battering ram.

"Oh, my God! my God! what will become of us!" screamed my wife, while all the children joined in the cry of terror.

"The noise outside and inside together was enough to confuse a man of coolness and nerve, and for a few moments I stood half bewildered. I observed, however, that the door remained firm, and this served to reassure me.

"Silence!" I shouted, stamping my foot; and having succeeded in checking the cries of my own family, I again addressed myself to those outside.

"If you think there is any one here but my own household, I said, 'you are altogether mistaken—no stranger has refuge under my roof.'

"You lie!" called back a savage voice.

"I am a man of peace," I continued—have lived here some years—have always minded my own business, and have never molested any one. I have no enemies that I am aware of, and certainly do not desire to harm anyone."

"Well, open the door, then, and let us in, and we'll talk the matter over."

"No," returned I, "you are very much mistaken if you think I will now open the door to men who act like so many ruffians. If you get in at all, you will have to break in, and if you do break in, then God have mercy on some of your sinful souls! for I am well armed, and shall defend myself to the last. I do not wish to be considered as making threats, and many warning, by telling you, as I now do, that unless you retire during the next few minutes, and leave me in peace, some of you will never depart alive!"

This announcement was received by wild shouts of derision and rage, and the efforts upon the door were renewed with greater violence. I said no more to the ruffians, but went back to examine my weapons and ammunition, get my wife and children to go down into the cellar, as the safest place, and otherwise prepare for a deadly contest.

"Besides my double-barrelled rifle and a brace of revolvers, I had a fowling piece; and this my hired man, one Stephen Jones, as quiet and brave a fellow as ever lived, had already taken down and was in the act of loading with a heavy charge of buck-shot and slugs. I handed him one of my revolvers, and requested him to see that it was well-loaded and capped, at the same time asking him if he intended to stand by me at all hazards.

"To the death!" he replied quietly, compressing his lips and knitting his brows with that look of fixed determination which is more assuring than words.

"I embraced my wife and children, and insisted upon their going below, for a time at least; and then, having seen my fire-arms all in order, and put two axes convenient to my hand, I looked at my watch, blew out the light, and softly opened the shutter of a window nearest the door, where the ruffians, some eight or ten in number, were still at work trying to break in, their oaths and curses keeping time with their blows. I considered I had given them warning enough; and as the five minutes had by this time fully expired, I reached out my arm, pointed my revolver toward them, and fired six shots in almost as many seconds.

"If you ever heard a band of Indians yell, you can form some idea of the response to my attack; and as I drew in my arm and secured the shutter, I heard one groan out that he was killed, another that his arm was broken, a third that he was hit in the leg, and several others that now they would have my life in revenge. There was indeed a rush to the window, which I had just left, and a discharge of several pistols and three or four rifles, which, for any harm they did, might just as well have been fired against a stone wall.

"Here, Stephen," said I, quietly, as I exchanged revolvers with him, "hurry and reload this, while I give the villains the contents of the other."

"Don't be too rash!" he replied; "I think they are all about the window."

"But the other window commands this," I rejoined; and then first assuring my frightened wife of my safety, and that all was going well, I stole up cautiously, opened the other shutter, fired the same as before, and closed it ere the ruffians could get to it, though not until a chance shot had whizzed past my head, and plowed a small furrow on my shoulder—a flesh wound of no further consequence than as showing how near I had been to losing my life.

"After this, for a few minutes, there seemed to be a great confusion and commotion among the ruffians outside, who were evidently not at all pleased with the way matters were going. As they now took the precaution to draw back some distance from the house, I could not distinguish what they said; but I judged that some four or five had been wounded, and one or two badly, if not mortally. For perhaps five minutes I could hear the sound of voices, gradually growing more and more distant, and then a trampling sound, as of horses, which soon died away into silence.

"Thank God! the villains have left us!" said Stephen.

"But how soon to return?" said I, not believing that we had got rid of them altogether.

"Now called up my wife, and reassured her as well as I could—though the truth was, I felt very ill at ease myself, and my voice and manner showed it. I did not regret anything I had done—for I had only acted in self-defense, in a case of extremity—but I could not help the reflection that I had drawn blood, if not taken life, and that I should henceforth be a marked man by unknown enemies, who would probably lay in wait till an opportunity should present of obtaining their revenge by the murder of myself, or family, or perhaps both.

"It was perhaps a couple of hours after the departure of my unknown assailants, that, as I was slowly walking to and fro in the still darkened room in a meditative mood, my wife having laid down with the children, and Jones being stretched out on the hearth in a doze, my attention was attracted to certain reddish streaks of light along the floor. One glance at the fire-place showed me they did not come from the smouldering embers, and then the truth flashed upon me—my barn was on fire—I ran to a rear window, cautiously put back the shutter a few inches, and saw it all in flames; while on a hill overlooking it, and some quarter of a mile distant from me, was a small group of horsemen, whom I believed to be the incendiaries and my late assailants. It was only the work of a minute to step back, seize my rifle, adjust the sights, take deliberate aim, and fire; and then it was, with a sort of savage joy, to which I had heretofore been a stranger, that I saw one of the scoundrels fall from his horse, and the others hastily pick him up and ride away.

"Of course there was no sleep for the older members of my household that night, and for weeks, and even months, my house became my fort, which I only left when obliged to, and then always well armed and on the alert for a hidden foe.

"But I never saw my assailants again to my knowledge, and to this day I have no idea who they were, what they intended, nor what they actually suffered at my hands. They burned my barn, destroyed my hay, killed some of my cattle, and stole three good horses, besides giving my family a fright they never got over till I left the country, which I did the following spring, selling out at less than two-thirds of the real value. This was the only real trouble I met with during my residence in the territory; and had it not been for the feelings of one dearer to me than my own, I should have been on the soil to this day, either living or dead.

A POSE.—On Sunday a lady called to her little boy, who was tossing marbles on the sidewalk, to come into the house: "Don't you know you should not be out there, my son? Go into the back yard if you want to play marbles. It is Sunday." "Well, yes, but ain't I Sunday in the back-yard mother?"

Brown Spruce Beer.—Pour eight gallons of water into a barrel, and then eight gallons more boiling hot; add twelve pounds of molasses, and half a pound essence of spruce; and when nearly cold, put in half a pint of good ale yeast. Stir well, and let it stand over night, and then add the sugar, and pack in sawdust or sand, when it will be ripe and fit to drink in a fortnight.

THE CONFEDERATE ONSET.—AN AWFUL SCENE.—An extract from a private letter of a member of Battery A, N. Y. Artillery, in the 1st Division, better known as the "Napoleon gun battery," in the first day of the first day's battle before Richmond, says:—

"Our spherical case shot are awful missiles, each of them consisting of a clotted mass of seventy-six musket balls, with a charge of powder in the centre, that is fired by a fuse the same as a shell. The missiles are sent flying through the air, and when they strike first acts as a solid shot, and then nearly as a shower of musket balls, that mow down the foe in heaps. Our battery threw twenty-four of these in a minute, and as we had the exact range of every part of the field, every shot told with frightful effect. But the enemy were not at all daunted. They marched steadily on, and hailed a perfect tempest of shot and shell. Why we, as well as our horses, were not every one shot down, will forever remain a mystery to me. We did not mind the leaden hail, however, but kept pouring our case shot into the dense masses of the foe, who came on in prodigious and overwhelming force. And they fought splendidly too. One shot tore through their ranks, and scattered them asunder in a manner we thought it was a miracle; but they closed up again at once, and came on as steadily as English veterans. When they got within four hundred yards, we closed our case shot and opened on them with canister, and such destruction I never elsewhere witnessed. At each discharge gaps were made in their ranks—indeed, whole companies were mowed down before that murderous fire; but they closed up with an order and discipline that was awe-inspiring. They seemed to be animated with the courage of despair blended with the hope of a speedy victory if they could by any overwhelming rush drive us from our position. It was awful to see their ranks shattered and torn by the discharge of canister shot, and to see them rushing right into their faces, and while their dead and dying lay in piles, closed up, and still kept advancing right in the face of that fire.

At one time, three lines, one behind another, were steadily advancing, and three of their regiments were brought within range of one of our guns shot with canister. "Fire!" shouted the general and down went those three lines, and a gap was opened through those three lines, as if a thunderbolt had torn through them, and the dead lay in swarms. But they at once closed up, and came steadily on, never halting or wavering, right through the gaps, and sweeping everything before them, capturing every piece. When we delivered our last fire, they were within fifteen or twenty paces of us, and as all our horses had been killed or wounded, we could not carry off a gun. Our whole division was cut to pieces, with what losses I do not know. We cut to pieces, with what losses I do not know. We held the enemy in check till reinforcements arrived, and then we kept our position till night put an end to the battle."
