Well we know in private life that the same thing constantly happens. It constantly happens that when a man is engaged with his whole heart and will upon some enterprise which he thinks vital to his well being, and when some other person is known to have said that he thinks the enterprise ought not to be undertaken, great irritability, great susceptibility is the result, and such a state of things arises in despite of the inclination of the men themselves in whom there is no disposition to quarrel and to contention. I believe that is a true disposition, on the whole, of the state of things between England and America at the time when the case of the Trent occurred and produced so profound a sensation in this country.

"When the case occurred I need not say it was the duty of the Government to use their very best exertions, above all and before all, to examine the facts and the law of the case, because if we had been mistaken in our view of the facts and the law; I hold that whatever our inclinations might be to maintain the honor of our country, our first duty is not to distort facts. but to pay strict obedience to laws, and especially to those laws prevailing between nation and nation, the creation of which is one of the grandest results of modern civilization, and the maintenance of which is a vital necessity the best exertions in our power to inform ourselves,
