In Latin Deetretches of Island, intervale, and gen ly roding uplands, clad with verdure and dotted with the neatly white washed buildings of the habitans, but that astonishment is vastly increased when, rising an eminence from which those features, to which we have reterred come grandly into view, for miles on either side, we behold in the direction in which we have been travelling the spire and turrets of a large and imposing religious structure, such as the St. Basil Ryman Catholic Chapel, with, a little beyond, the handsome buildings devoted to the purposes of the St. Bisil Female Academy. In the presence of these one cannot divest themselves of the idea o being in the vicinity of a large city rather than a rural district hundreds of miles away from city life.
