SAMUEL WATTS.

It is but proper that in assuming the Proprietorship of this establishment I should state that it shall be my endeavor to maintain its popularity, by following out the same general line of management as heretofore; contracts and agreements with reference to advertising and subscriptions will remain untouched until the expiration of the time for which made; and engagements with reference to the same in the future, made by the Editor, will be Tuesday in January-viz: on the 13th inst. valid, whose signature to all receipts and obligations will be binding.

A New Volume.

We commence at once a new volume and a new year, with this issue. These mutual resting places in life are seasonable, and should be useful. If time and life moved on, only broken in their monotony by night and day, men would grow old without feeling aware of the fact, and would lose half of the little pleasure of life, a large portion of which i now derived from periodical seasons devoted to retrospective and forward glances into the future .-The period which ends one year and begins another is, by common consent, given up to some extent by most individuals to such a purpose. Happy for those who can, while so devoting their moments, to the rendering of them more useful, more blessed actions of the past, and makes up his balance sheet from Richmond. as a guide for the future, and so, it would be well if men carefully and diligently canvassed their lives and made themselves aware by incontrovertible figures, of the preponderance of good or evil in the

But the retrospective of a newspaper has to embrace a heterogenous mixture of things, and must of the position it occupies, a very solemn amount of responsibility. It reaches nearly every family in the community. From it the mother takes her tales and stories with which to sooth her little ones to sleep. The lads and lasses of the family find in it that which is food to their peculiar mental organism-the light tale; the amusing anecdote, the literary gem, the scientific record; and then the elder

The rear the said her bod of the of excitement in it that we need not, to-day, remind our readers of the particular events; they have been read as occurring, and are too well remembered .-Prominent among these, as one destined to show conspicuously upon the pages of history, are the war in the United States and the famine in England, the direct result of that war. It was thought, at one time, that fighting, on a grand scale, had been confined to the Old World; the fallacy of such opinion is being daily proved.
