About Farms and Farmers.

the feeling of every Farmer might be

" Happy, whose only wish and care, A few paternal acres bound, Content to breathe his native air, On his own ground."

Every one has his and her cares, and the Farmer has his; but to him who owns a sufficient number of acres to yield bread and meat, and wearing apparel for his family, who has strength to till his land, and owns the land he tills; who at quiet eventide, the toil of the day over, can sit surrounded by a healthy family. and look out from beneath his own roof tree upon his wide sown crops; who after the morning meal can go forth cheerily to the labor of the day,-to plough, or sow, or reap; who has no restless nights or anxious hours, in view of notes falling due and an over drawn exchequer to meet them with; who knows nothing about that complicated, wearisome, demoralizing, debit and credit system, which has become a necessity to every other branch of business, and by the machination of which so many suffer; who don't have to sue to recover or be sued to be recovered from; surely such men should be happy. The farmer may look upon other men and think they follow a more congenial business, but he little knows of the gloom, and anxiety, and care which underlie the apparently prosperous surface, if he could fully realize them, he would thankfully recognize the good providence by which his lot was made so much more desirable, and contentedly repress any rising of ambition to leave the farm for the workshop or the store. Ot course, these remarks, more particularly, apply to those who have farms cleared, and made, and cannot so fully to those who enter the forests to make war apon it, and to create a farm from its wildernesses; to these there is the promise of the same independence, the same serene feelings, but to reach them in the same degree as in the other case there is a pretty hard road to travel, and much to make one hand and heart weary; still the toil is invigorating to the muscle and mind, and the promise in the future is fruitful and rich. Whatever our farmers are, and however much they may be surrounded with the practical necessities of life, it is undisguisable that a want of taste, intelligent taste, exists. True, this is not nearly so evident as it was a few years since, because the farmers in this County and the neighboring, have of late made long strides in the direction of cultivating a taste for what is beautiful, as well as for what is necessary. The character of the farm houses is improved; neatness and paint now prevail where carelessness and sombre walls before held reign .-But we should like to see these evidences more general. Why should not our Farmers, of all men, surround themselves with whatever is calculated to make home more attractive to their families, and more noticeable to the passer by. A coat of whitewash is not expensive, if paint is too much so, and is a great improvement upon time-blackened walls, whether of house or barns. Trees tastefully selected are an inexpensive adornment to a farm house. A flewer patch in front of the house would cost but very tew cents, and require but a little occasional attention; and how much it would add to the happiness of the family, as well as to the appearance says truly :-

economy misapplied, to spend it in adorning their home. There is no investment that pays so large a day enjoyments, mental luxuries, and social and intellectual pleasures. I do not mean to be understood that the farmer or his family should be extravagant and launch into all the foolish follies of the tes the means of enjoyment for others as well as himself.
