Intercolonial Railroad No. VII.

The figures quoted last week give at sight conclusive estimate of the character of the coun try and its inhabitants on either of the proposed routes, North or Frontier. The agricultural and manufacturing development of a country is the most important index to the character of that country, and we find that in the four Frontier Counties the value of the agricultural and manufacturing productions is at a low estimate $13,-093,091, or about $180 per head on the inhabitants of '61; in the Northern Counties they amount to $7,981,784, or $149 per head on their inhabitants, they having 16,505 inhabitants less than the Frontier Counties.

Then it must be remembered that if the Intercolonial takes the Frontier route, via the St. Andrews Road and Western is, that the Fenians are "plotting, planning and Extension, it will accommodate the larger portion of the inhabitants of the county of St. John directly, which it would not do by any of the Northern routes or many of the Central ones. And it appears to us that as regards the imme diate traffic to be secured to the road, and especially the advantages to accrue to St. John, i is of the utmost importance that the road should take that city in its course, rather than make an indirect connection with it by striking the E. & N. A. road eastward of the city. This is so im portant a consideration to the community of St. John, that it has been a matter of the utmos surprise, that her press and people have not taken a more lively interest in the matter and made some attempt to enlighten the public mind of Canada and England on the subject this route St. John would secure the large proportion of through freight for shipment, although the passenger traffic might pass through to Halifax. We presume that with the superior advantages presented by the harbour of St. John, shippers would prefer freighting from that port, the cost of freight to Europe being no more thence than from Halifax, while the expense of railway between the two cities would be saved. senting a position likely to deter any attempt at
