"WITHOUT HOPE OF CHANGE. Days when I lived a happy maid, When we three little sisters played, Bright days that knew no touch of shade

Come back ye days, or ever I From out the rose-grown balcony Had looked upon him passing by, And burned with the unbidden flame. That made me shudder at his name, Flush at his praise, nor brook his blame I loved him all my girlhood through Across my soul his presence grew Through thought of him each thought I drew

Of him I dreamed; my dreams were sweet, In dreams we ever seemed to meet, Waking I listened for his feet. At length he came, woe worth the day Wood Margaret, and bore away, Plighted to be his own for aye. All slowly now my hours crept,

And yet I mourned not, neither wept Within myself my grief I kept. I lived, my lot was very hard, From him I loved forever barred, Loving unloved my life was marred; I kept no count of that dull time My beauty faded from its prime. And then (O God, forgive the erime) Despairing evermore, I said, "I would that Margaret were dead!"

She died; my prayer was answered. He came, I saw him yet again, I strove to win him, all in vain, Edith he chose-it turned my brain. Edith is his: my blackest spell Can work them naught but what is well For me, I live in present hell. There is what time I would repent. But all in vain my knees are bent;

Ah me! my day of grace is spent.

I see the dreaded shadow come,

I feel my everlasting doom.

But know not horror of the tomb-
