PRAYER ON THE BATTLE FIELD. TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN BY MISS . H. WOLHAUPTER.

Father, I call to Thee! Flashing before me is the blaze of battle Roaring around me is the cannon's rattle, Thou ruler of battles, I trust in Thee, Father hear, and save Thou me.

Father hear, and shelter me! I call to Thee! with each hurried breath, Lead me to victory, guide me till death,
My country's freedom, I ask of Thee, Though I die in the conflict, may " Deutch land" be free.

My God, I trust in Thee! Comrades like leaves of the Autumn are calling, Fountain of Blessings, I call to Thee:

Father hear and strengthen me. Father hear, and bless me! Into Thy hands I give my life, Offer it up to Thee, in the battle's strife To live, to die, as it is Thy will.

Father hear, and save me still. Father, I praise Thee! This is a struggle, our land to free, The right to contend for, and liberty, If falling I conquer, the praise shall be Thi Father, Thy strength is mine.

Father, Thy strength is mine! I yield to no tyrant, no despot's chain.

To Thee my God, I yield to Thee; Father I know Thou art hearing me. Bloomfield, Carleton Co. memory serves us it bears a strong resemblance to an old translation of Korner's battle prayer Select Tale.

THE STROKE OF A PEN.

IN TWO CHAPTERS.—CHAPTER I A father and son stood together in the bowwindow of a lodging-house at Hythe. The tall, soldierly figure of the father leant against the sloping pauels, and he was looking out over the sea with an expression that seemed partly grief, partly embarassment. An old Indian veteran; Captain Seton's face was bronzed by exposure to climate, but his blue eyes were still both bright and soft, and his hair, though grey, was thick and glossy. His son closely resembled him, but his expression was perhaps a thought less pleasant than his father's, and the mouth a trifle weaker, while his face lacked the dignity conferred by Captain Seton's thick grey beard. The son was speaking. "You saw Dr. Malcolm this morning, father? SURVEYOR OF LUMBER, days yet. I wish I could stay, but it is quite
