On the next day, Hughes' friends made a pro-cession, carrying the remains in front of a hearse. When they arrived opposite Baird's the pro-cession halted, as by previous concert, and the whole number, about two thousand men, kneeling down, shouted, "Marder, murder," and prayed meledictions upon Baird and his house-hold. At other places in Ireland there were riots but no deaths are reported.

According to a Berlin letter of recent date that has appeared in some of the English papers, Count Bismarck did not leave office solely on account of ill health, but for other reasons which may have a very important bearing on the im-mediate future of Europe. The ill-health, it is now said, was only a prefence, though he was sufficiently ill to make it a fair excuse for his retirement, intended to be temporary, but which d may become permanent. He retired from office would not have war with France, though he is is war Minister, and Gen. von Multke, and many "great war" in '66 as leads them to "ask for more" They have lapped blood, and they like it.
