MR. CARDWELL ON THE NEW COLONIAL MR. CARDWELL ON THE NEW COLONIAL POLICY.—Mr. Cardwell, Secretary of War, Great Britain, made a long speech to his constituents at Oxford, on the 29th ult., a brief extract from which has already been given to the public. We quote the following:—

"Gentlemen, with regard to the army, you have an army of which you may well be proud. A French marshal has been quoted as having said but the Prussian infantry, were the finest said that the Prussian infantry were the finest in the world, but, happily, that is for their opponents, there are few of them. If there are very few that leads to the conclusion that you are to have them maintained in the highest state of efficiency, both as to men and material. You are entitled also to have them as much as may e concentrated in this country, and placed, in regard to reserved forces, in the most close combination, so that they may be so far welded and consolidated together as the nature of those dif-ferent forces demands. We never had anything systematic, perhaps, in this country. All our forces are voluntary.
