SUMMER.

BY SAMUEL WATTS.

Whence these soft airs, that fan my cheek?

These sounds, upon my ear that break?

Perfumes and sights, that, to each sense

Come with a charmed eloquence?

'Tis summer's herald, bright and fair,

They, for the approaching June prepare—

On wood and stream and atmosphere;

On landscape more remote or near;

Above, below, o'er nature's vast

The signal, of her coming, cast.

Welcome thee, Summer! take thy throne;

Welcome the joys that with thee come.

The birds, the balmy breath, the flowers;

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

These, all are thine and thou art ours.

When her babe was born, she endured a long and severe illness, suffered for want of fresh air,
and swallowed an immense amount of nauseous drugs; while the nurse stuck pins into the baby, banded it like an Egyptian mummy, smothered it in flannel, and dosed it with tea and paragon. And Angie submitted to all these afflictions because she knew no better.
How should she, when Mrs. Tucker considered it highly improper and unnecessary for girls to know anything concerning physiology, hygiene and medicine?

Her baby was sickly, crying and fretful, very wearing on her nerves and trying to her patience—as though the poor little creature could be otherwise, considering all the circumstances.
But, then, nobody was to blame, for girls are afraid and ashamed to have a knowledge of their physical structure and of the laws of hereditary descent—and the world comments on this as a modesty.

Select Tale.

FASHIONABLE IGNORANCE.

BY CASTLE.

Angelina Isabella Tucker was preparing for her wedding.

True, she was only seventeen, about half developed physically, and in an embryo state mentally and morally; but the sooner she was settled off her father's hands, the better—for Mrs. Tucker had taught her from her cradle that the only proper desire and aim of woman's existence is to "get married," and that to remain single is a terrible disgrace. "Marry well if you can," was Mrs. Tucker's doctrine; "but at all events marry."

Accordingly, Angie, as she was called by everybody except her mother, was kept in the
house from her childhood, for fear of injuring
her complexion; not allowed to work because
of enlarging her hands and wrists; and laced
till she could hardly breathe, to obtain that crowning point of beauty and attraction, a small waist.

Her father, as she was called by
everybody except her mother, was kept in the
house from her childhood, for fear of injuring
her complexion; not allowed to work because
of enlarging her hands and wrists; and laced
till she could hardly breathe, to obtain that
crowning point of beauty and attraction, a small
waist.
