Poetry.

"IF."

If, sitting with his little, worn-out shoe, And scarlet stockings lying on my knee, I saw the little feet that had pattered through pearl lit gates that he 'twixt heaven and me,
I could be reconciled and happy, too,
And look with glad eyes toward the Jasper sea.

If, in the morning, when the song of birds Reminds me of a music far more sweet, I listen for his pretty, broken words,
And for the music of his dimpled feet, I could be almost happy, though I heard No answer, and but saw his vacant seat.

I could be glad if, when the day is done,
And all its cares and heart-aches laid away, I could look westward, to the hidden sun,
And with a heart full of sweet yearnings say,
"To-night I'm happier than my little one, By just the travel of one earthly day."

If I could know these little feet were shod In shoes wrought of light in better lands, And that the footprints of a tender God Ran side by side with his, in golden sands, I could bow cheerfully, and kiss the rod, Since darling was in wisest, safer hands.

If he were dead, I would not sit to-day, And stain with tears the wee socks on my knee, I would not kiss the tiny shoe, and say, "Bring back again my little boy to me!"
I would be patient, knowing 'twas God's way, And that he'd lead me to him, o'er death's silent sea.

But, oh! to know the feet, once pure and white, The haunts of vice had boldly ventured in!
The hands that should have battled for the right,
Have been wrung crimson in the clasp of sin!
And should he kneel at Heaven's gate to-night, To fear my boy could hardly enter in!

Select Tale.
A PRAIRIE STORY.

In the year 1819, a family of emigrants from New England established themselves in an uninhabited prairie near what was then the extreme borders of Western civilization. They consisted of a husband and wife, the widowed sister of the latter, and her infant child. No neighborly greeting awaited them, for they were the only dwellers within a circuit of miles; and the nearest settlement was half a day's journey distant. The widow was a lovely but broken spirited woman of twenty-two.
Since her husband's death, her affections were centered in her babe. She had been left in comfortable circumstances; in fact, her brother-in-law being a poor man, the land they occupied, together with the farming stock and implements, were purchased by her means.
A few months' labor sufficed to give the family a comfortable home, and to surround it with many signs of commencing prosperity.
Autumn had passed, and they were looking forward to a season of comparative ease.
The next morning, when the sun had been slightly overcast with a rising wind from the north east; but none of the family were prepared for the sight which they encountered the morning after his return. A slight fall of snow which began the night before, had increased to such a degree that the drifting material was piled almost to the eaves of the cabin, and already rendered impossible every road that led to it. They were close prisoners, with no prospect of a speedy release, for the storm continued all day with the utmost fury. At first, but little alarm was felt by the blockaded inmates. Their wood pile was sheltered and easily accessible, and the food on hand would suffice for one or four days, and the end of which time they had no doubt the purchased supplies would reach them. They had never heard of the terrific tempests which sometimes, in that latitude, convert the prairies into a howling ocean of snow for weeks together.

The fifth day came and went and still the storm raged on. They were now almost buried on all sides, and the cold had become intense.
At length, when they had been three days without food, he who should have been their protector to the end, began to throw out hints which made the widow's heart sink like lead within her bosom.

Next day, he spoke out more plainly. One of them, he said, must be sacrificed to save the rest, and that one must be the youngest and most useless. The wretched woman clasped her infant more closely, and shrunk into the further corner of the room, as she heard the threat, and marked the glance which accompanied it—a glance telling not more of hunger than of hate. It was clearly to suppose that the man's brain was disordered by his sufferings; but yet it was evident that this dire emergency had also served to bring into open view the workings of malignant passions long and craftily concealed. The widow had for some time suspected that her brother-in-law regarded herself and her child with little warmth of affection; she knew him to be avaricious and unscrupulous; but she had not thought that he would have been so wicked as to reveal his hate to a monster!

Now, however, in those wolfish eyes, as ever and anon they glared upon her darling, she read, even before her lips declared it, the fell purpose with which the demons of greed and famine had joined to inspire him. A single stroke, he had determined, should both even the lingering fate which every day brought nearer, and sweep the main obstacle from his path to competence; for the widow was thought to be consumptive and, failing her offspring, his wife, her sister, was his only heir. Mrs.
Hartwell had already succumbed to privation and anxiety. The widow and her natural connection were thus left, as it seemed, to be the sole actors in this hideous tragedy which was shortly to ensue.

Another day passed.
By this time, Hartwell had consumed what was left of his stock of liquors, and wrought into a state of half-maniacal excitement. Seeing his opportunity, while the widow was uneasily dozing, with her child in her arms, he advanced, knife in hand, towards them. Before he reached them she awoke and fled, striking with the babe into the adjoining room where she flung herself down beside her halfinanimate sister, and called upon her wildly for protection. The object of the appeal was roused to momentary consciousness. She partially lifted herself, and motioned to her husband, who hastily concealed his weapon, and slunk, as if he were struck, from the chamber.

The widow immediately rose, and after fastening the door, expended the remnant of her strength in piling against it some bulky articles of furniture. This done, she sank fainting beside her sister, who had relapsed into her former condition.

When she recovered the use of her senses, she came on and all around her was wrapt in darkness. The single window in the room was directly behind her, and opened upon the rude piazza which sheltered that side of the dwelling. After a short interval, the widow became aware that some one outside was endeavoring to unfasten the heavy wooden shutters. Incapable of further resistance, she could only lie in breathless silence awaiting the result.

In a few moments the shutters were flung apart, and her brother-in-law's body was protruded through the opening, which was with out sashes. His arm was raised, and again the knife hung suspended over the head of the unconscious wife. The helpless woman closed her eyes, and sent up a silent prayer to that Power who once before had turned aside the fatal stroke. At that moment she heard from beneath the window a low, hoarse growl, mingled with snarl, snarling yells, as from a crowd of infuriated animals. Then a shriek of mortal terror burst from the lips of the wife, as she saw; his knife dropped harmless beside his intended victim; he leaped for a few moments frantically at the window ledge, and then disappeared, dragged down by some resistless force.

When the widow again regained consciousness, she found herself and child in the hands of friends by whom their wants were tenderly supplied. Within two hours after the storm had subsided, a party from a village had succeeded in making their way to the solitary cabin. Mrs.
Hartwell was already dead. Her sister was at first supposed to be beyond hope of recovery, but by care and skill her restoration was effected.

A few rods from the clearing, the body of Hartwell was discovered almost devoured by wolves, who had been emboldened by famine to surround the house.

The mother lived to see her babe, thus strangely rescued, grow to vigorous manhood.

A GENUINE YANKEE.—Some years since an acquaintance of ours set out on horseback from the east part of Massachusetts for the Great Mountain of Vermont. While travelling through the town of New Salem his road led into a piece of woods, of some miles in length, where he was obliged to dismount. When he entered doubts whether he should ever be able to extricate himself from the thicket, but as his blister with the sight of a habitation but as all things must have an end, so at last had the woods and the nut brown house of a farmer greeted his vision. Near the road was a tall, rawboned, overgrown, lantern jawed boy, probably 17 years of age, digging potatoes. His long coat of time had beaten the top in, or lacking in the length of his low breeches was amplified up in width; his suspenders appeared to be composed of birch bark, grape vine and sheep skin; and as for his hat, which was of dingy white felt—poor thing! it had evidently seen better days—but now, alas! it was only the shadow of its glory. Whether the boy was a native or a foreigner, no one could tell. There was no man who had a range so boundless, as the man who was at peace with God. And yet there are multitudes of persons who suppose that there are peculiar pleasures which cannot be reaped except by a reprobate course. There never was any greater mistake than that—Becher.

GOD BLESS YOU.—Who has not felt the power of those words? Who does not treasure up those hallowed moments of the irrevocable past, when from the lips of some loved one fell the words "God bless you," that found an echo in the truest and purest feelings of heart? A God bless you! and that will go with us through life, and bring peace and con-fort when all things else are shrouded in gloom and no joy seems awaiting the heart so long acquainted with sorrow. Dying lips in feeble accents have murmured "God bless you." It gives the ear of infancy and retains the wayward youth. It has been heard at the bridal and said at the tomb. Loved voices thronged in our ears when we parted, and the sound still lingers to cheer our saddened hearts. Oh! may we hear it through life, and when we stand on the brink of those waters which flow between time and eternity, may the last words that break upon our listening ears be the God bless you which comes from the lips of loved ones left behind.

CURE OF STAMMERING.—The effectual cure mainly depends upon the determination of the sufferer to carry out the following rule:—Keep the teeth close together, and before attempting to speak inspire deeply; then give time for quiet inspiration, and after very little practice the hesitation will be relieved. No spasmodic action of the lower jaw must be permitted to separate the teeth when speaking. This plan, regularly carried out for six months, cured me when twenty years old. It was painfully bad, both to myself and to others. Without determination to follow out the plan, it is of no use attempting it.

A worthy old clergyman in a neighboring town is very absent-minded and has a very short memory. It is a very common habit with him to slip the pulpit to forget something, and then sitting down, to rise up again, and begin his supplementary remarks with "By the way." A few Sundays ago he got half way through a prayer when he hesitated, forgot what he was about, and sat down abruptly without closing.
An object or two he rose, and pointing his forefinger at the amazed congregation, he said:
"Oh! by the way—Amen!"

An Indian couple being opposed to the lover of their daughter, kept a savage dog to guard their child. The lover brought another savage dog to the house and set the two to fighting; the old folks came out to part them, and the lovers clipped off the back-ward and got married.

"Yes, sir, 'twas a spell ago, and I don't believe it grows much shorter since."
"Much obliged—good bye."
"Good bye to you—That's a darn sick mare of yours!"

There reader—There is a Jonathan of the first water for you. You don't find his equal anywhere.

THE DRESS OF CHILDREN.—Now that winter is approaching, it behooves parents more than ever to see that their children are clothed in such a manner as to protect them from the inclemency and sudden changes of the weather.
The chief cause of infantile mortality, in addition to foul air, or too rich or too poor food, is the false pride of many mothers. Children are killed by the manner in which they are dressed, as certainly as by any other cause. In our changeable climate children of the most tender age are left with bare arms and legs, and with low-necked dresses. The
