To my Mother.

BY FRANK.

And muse upon the days gone by;

At that still hour I love to dwell, On seasons past most dear to me;

And gently o'er my soul a spell Comes, and I love to think of thee.

Then, too, I think of the better land,

Of that world from sorrow free;

And I'll no more sigh for thee

British Empire was assumed to be on the decline. Thirteen noble provinces had just been lost. She had been humiliated by land and sea. Her power on the American continent had been shaken to its foundations. Her had been shaken to its foundations. Her great rival had defeated and triumphed over her; and, with her capital imperilled by mobs, and her treasury loaded down with debt, she had but a grim outlook for the future at that disastrous period. But the people round the old homestead were not discouraged. The brain power was not exhausted, nor the physical forces spent. They went on thinking, working and fighting, as though, like Antaus, they gathered strength from their fall; and now, at the end of four-fifths of a century, let us at the end of four-fifths of a century, let us Items Foreign & Local. momentary pause, twirling the circlet in the moon-light.
