Poetry.

The Love of Long Ago. Like the witching dream of an olden time, Or the soft, sweet sound of silver chime,

A memory thrills my spirit to-night, And floods my life with a tender light, I have swept the sombre curtain aside, That draped the Past, and its halls of pride And softly I tread the shadowy ways That lead to this light of by-gone days.

And a dusky cloud sweeps over the sky As I catch the breath of a lingering sigh. I listen now with a throb of pain

To the softened swell of a sad refrain

Its glory undimmed by dust or mould,

And I welcome it back with an eager start

Wrecked Lives.

Slowly and feebly the life-blood coursed through the veins of a beautiful dying woman lying there before the open window, gazing for the last time upon a clear autumn day. At her side knelt a girl not more than 12 years old, but with such a brown eyes, that you could feel that, in spite of her tender years, that her youth was past; that she would never again know the gladsome joys of her childhood. Very like were the two, mother and We have used the Dominion Steam Washer for some time, and the more we use it the better we like it, my wife could not do without it, she thinks the Maker. OUR PORTLAND CORRESPONDENCE

MR. EDITOR,-We started after an early breakfast at the hotel, hoping to reach the foot of Mount Washington in time for an afternoon train to the summit. Our ride was one of unsurpassed beauty with the grand mount-
