Poetry.
Keeping His Word.
"Only a penny a box," he said;
But the gentleman turned away his head,
As if he thought from the equal sight
Of the boy who stood in the falling light.
"Oh, sir," he stammered, "you cannot know,"
(And he brushed from his matches the flakes of snow.)
Then the sudden tear might have chance to fall
"Or I think—I think you would to a them all."
"Hungry and cold at our guest-parlor,"
Rudely will watch till I come again,
Bringing the loaf. The sun has set,
And he hasn't a crumb of breakfast yet.
"One penny and then I can buy the bread,"
The gentleman stopped. "And you?" he said.
"I—I can put up with it, hungry and cold,
But Ruby is only five years old."
"I promised our mother before she went,
I'll keep it, and I'll keep it to the end—
I promise you, sir, through best, through worst,
I'll always should think of Ruby first."
The gentleman paused at his open door:
Such tales he had often heard before;
But he turned his head and saw the light
Of the moon shining on a shilling here.
"Oh, sir, if you only take the pack,
I'll bring you the change in a moment back;
Indeed you may trust me?" "Trust you?"
But here the shilling, take it, and go."
