The Crownless.

BY A. H. LINTON. O souls that bravely do and dare!
O hearts that to the truth are loyal! A crown of glory ye should wear,
For ye, and only ye, are loyal!
The ermined forms who sit in state,

And sway their sceptres o'er the nations Are least of all the earth-born great Who claim our praises and oblations. He most deserves a crown who stands, When others mock at his endeavor, Upholding Right with heart and hands, Nor yielding in his efforts ever!

He is the truest king of all Who, at his conscience's behest moving, Stands proudly up to win or fall,

But while they glittering appear There is no goodly glory in them! They only catch the gaze of men, Their glories vanish as one gazes; The crownless win their crowning when

They rest at last beneath the daisies.

O souls that bravely do and dare! Mankind at length shall own you royal The crown of glory you shall wear, If only you are very loyal! For service true hath its reward; There waits a coronation morning.

When faithful angels of the Lord Shall robe you with a king's adorning!
