TO MINNIE.
I may forget my youthful home,
I may forget my school-mates dear,
The paths, where once I loved to roam,
The scenes, which once my heart did cheer.
These may be banished from my heart,
And in my soul forgotten be;
But never from memory shall depart
The time I said, "Farewell" to thee.
Pen cannot tell nor words impart, Nor look, nor act of mine express The sorrow of my heavy heart, When called thy farewell hand to press.
But softly did I breathe the prayer,
On wings of faith to God above,
That He might grant his Minnie, dear, Erewhile thee, with arms of love.

BACKBONE.
When you see a fellow mortal
Without fixed and fearless views, Hanging on the skirts of others,
Walking in their cast-off shoes,
Bowing low to wealth or favor,
With a servile and fawning smile,
Ready to retreat or waver,
Willing to be done or led,
Walk yourself with firmer bearing,
Show your moral shoulders back,
Show your spine has nerve and marrow—
Just the things which his must lack.
A stronger word

When you see a fellow mortal
Without fixed and fearless views,
Hanging on the skirts of others,
Walking in their cast-off shoes,
Bowing low to wealth or favor,
With a servile and fawning smile,
Ready to retreat or waver,
Willing to be done or led,
Walk yourself with firmer bearing,
Show your moral shoulders back,
Show your spine has nerve and marrow—
Just the things which his must lack.

reception had robbed both of any appetite, and Helen even wondered whether she had been wise to break her resolution, and "marry a widower who had children."

"No one has ever any comfort with stepchildren," she thought.
And what can say what was in the man's mind? They were silent both of them.
And after lunch was over, the husband marched into Maggie's nursery, and addressed her sternly.

"You have been filling the child's head with notions," he said. "How dare you do it? Has insulted Mrs.
Bretman, and you are the cause. I've half a mind to send you packing; you deserve it."

"Have just a bit of pity on me and the boy and I'll never do it. All he's got to do," said Maggie, "is to blame me.
I'm old, and I remember better than a young man. She was a wretched lady."

"You were good to her and are still good to her child," said the gentleman gravely; "but remember no more of this underhand work. You must teach the child to love his new mother, and to obey her."

"Oh, my dear," said Maggie, "but love can't be taught, and we've but one mother in the world however many wives an husband we may have."

"The man looked at her sharply, but he had no insolence in her face; and he left the room and returned to his new wife, and saw no more of Freddie for that day. Indeed, the child did not seek him.
Never before had he been harshly used; and the shake his father had given him had been a terrible thing to him—the very confirmation of Maggie's prophecy.

More and more he clung to the old nurse, and though Mrs. Bretman tried to manage him, with both the old woman's grim face and cold monosyllables, and the child's passionate repulses were too much for her. She abandoned the effort and the boy took his meals in the nursery.
She never heard from him, and brooded in silence, as very little children do over his wrongs.

It was easy enough to forget him in the honeymoon billing and cooing, and the father was careful to give Maggie all she asked for—new shoes, and caps, and toys and such like. He was his duty as he often said, "he never forgot his duty to Maria's child." The lone boy, as fatherless as he was motherless dwelt alone, save for an old servant's faithful love, in the very room where his birth had been hailed with such rejoicing. "It's the new lady does it," said Maggie honestly believing it, and never guessing that she herself had caused the unnatural estrangement by her unwise chatter. She had taught the boy that his step-mother came as an enemy, else he would have greeted her with a kiss, and been petted until she came to love him as her own; else he would have been utterly forgotten when his bright winter sun rose over the world, and a little face that its setting had not shone upon, and Helen Bretman kissed the unconscious lips of her first born.

Little soul, little new born soul, I am not sure what miracles you may have worked. Have you ever read "Fogues" sweetest of Uddine, dear reader? do you remember how love gave the heroine a soul? Sometimes I think motherhood seems to work as marvellous
