Poetry. Erred Through Love-By Love Re-

WOODSTOCK, N. B., SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 23, 1872.

BY MRS. W. A. DUCHOW.

Old Satan looked from his den one night, And saw a woman gazing in; She wore a robe that once was white, But now 'twas stained with a mortal sin. He saw that her face was pale with woe, And laughed aloud in his fiendish glee, And said, "She's a sinful soul, I know, The world has sent her down to me.

And he thrust his bony fingers out, And clutched at the figure standing there. But swift as thought she whirled about, And ran like a lost soul in despair. But the Evil One was on her track, With a dozen followers in his wake;

And she knew, as her anguished eyes glance Her trembling form they would soon o'er-I know, I know, I've sinned," she cried,

"But O! kind heaven, will naught atone? I'll weep and pray 'till sanctified My feet may rest beside His throne. O! heed my prayer; 'twas love for him. Not thoughts of passion, made me fall; Beside that love all thoughts grew dim, He held my very soul in thrall.

He cast my heart, like a broken toy, With all its ruined virtue back; And left me 'reft of every joy, With a million scorners on my track. And he was never held so high,-So many to praise him and adore,-While I, in ruin, was left to die, A wretched sinner forevermore!"

But lo! they gained on her flying feet, And the bony fingers once more were And she felt the hand and her shoulder meet, And Satan with one terrific vell. And ere a second of time could tell, Had disappeared beneath the ground.

The woman paused in her fearful flight, Her weary knees sank down in prayer; For when she looked at the gleam of light, She saw an angel standing there. Her hands were clasped, her lips were mute, Her mournful head sunk low in shame; But sweet as the notes of a silver flute, Was the angel's voice when he spoke her

Look up, look up, poor, tired girl! Dost thou not know that Christ has died That all who wish to live apart From sin, may be all-purified That he has given no man the right A judgment on thy lot to cast? Look on thy robe now gleaming white, And know thou art forgiv'n at last."

From heaven a guardian angel wings Her flight thro' space to the bounds And o'er a mortal man she flings The mortal good of her higher birth. And with her pleading she has wrought So much of good there at His throne,

That he who cursed her life has sought

Penitent words his sins to own. And she who held him all too dear, Whom he cast as a bitter blight aside, Will gain him a place in that bright sphere Where she now rests with the purified. And Christ, who welcomed the fallen girl, And took the patient sinner in,
