"It Might Have Been."

'We mourn in secret o'er some buried love In the far past, whence love does not return, And strive to find among its ashes gray, Some lingering spark that may yet live and burn And when we see the vainness of our task, We flee away, far from the hopeless scene, And folding close our garments o'er our hearts, Cry to the winds, "O God! it might have been!

"Come, darling, sing my favorite, and then I must leave you!" And drawing his betrothed gently forward, Arthur Falkner seated her upon one of the low wicker chairs which was almost concealed by the clinging star jasmine and scarlet cypress, shading the tiny bird-nest affair of a porch,

She had followed him to the door, and they had both stood in the door-way, silently, for several minutes, watching the fair moon, as with her mellow beams she cast many and fantastic shadows upon the broad walk, and peering shyly through the twining vines upon the lattice, played " hide and seek" on

'Twas a sweet picture. "Yes, sing, 'ma petite,' I so long to hear my song to night." And seating himself at the girl's side, looked up in the pale face, with its sweet mouth and full red lips, dark gray eyes and heavy brows, the low but intellectual forehead, and small beautifully shaped head, with its crown of black hair, with a world of admiration in his dark eyes. No, Carrie Leslie was not beautiful, not even pretty, but she appeared was not a hut upon the place. When the founder, the indefatigable and enterprising Colonel Powell, (the present Duke) with his surveyor and his clerk, landed at Birmingham to lay off the streets they were compelled to go into camps. On the 8th of August, 1871, the foundation for the first house was laid, and on the 29th of August it was ready for use. On the 19th of December, thereafter, the city was incorporated by the Alabama Legislature (application having been made only three weeks before), and a mayor and city council were then immediately elected.
