The Old Garden.

But within were shelter and shadow,

There were alleys and lurking arbors-

Deep glooms into which to dive; The lawns were as soft as fleeces—

It had gathered a thoughtful grace

Seemed to have furrowed its face.

And the round about of the shadow

The flowers were all of the oldest

The rose-lamps flaming hung.

Along the borders fringed

And great-eyed hollyhocks.

Still wore quaint ornaments.

Its old wind hardly would stir,

Must feel it no place for her.

It was all so stately fantastic.

Red, and blood red, and dark purple,

With broad thick edges of box,

Stood foxgloves and gorgeous popples,

And ash-trees bowed into tents;

There was junipers trimmed into castles,

For the garden, tho' ancient and pensive,

Young spring, when she merrily entered

THE ATTIC OF A CHURCH CONVERTED INTO A DEN OF ROBBERS.-While some

workmen were engaged making alterations in a church, situated near Bronxville, a little station on the Harlem Railroad, in Winchester County, and about 15 miles distant from New York city, they accidentally discovered, a day or two ago, the headquarters of a gang of burglars in the attic of the edifice. It may be mentioned that the modest place of worship indicated stands in an isolated grove. about half a mile from the rail oad and within the limits of the town of East Chester .-The attic of the church has never been used for any purpose, and the only access to it from the body of the edifice was by means of a step-ladder employed only by the sexton when he climbed to the interior of the spire for the purpose of ringing the bell. While effecting some alterations in the wall at the pposite end of the building to that in which the belfry was situated, the carpenter found chairs, a kerosene stove for cooking, and sunat Widow Hawley's, who pretends to and more in connection with your daily ed by the British Admiralty to undertake a satchel were discovered over 200 skeleton
