One company has submitted a plan to the French and English governments in which it is proposed to construct a tunnel under the Channel of about 34,000 metres, and to connect it with railways at Calais and Dover by underground lines of ten kilometres in length. The company asks no pecuniary compensation from either country, but stipulates for the exclusive right to work the railway and freedom from competition. The English government, while approving the plan and wishing to see it carried out, objects to granting the monopoly asked refuses its assent to that proposition. It also thinks that before any definite arrangement is entered into the plans of the Company should be laid before the public. The French government concurs in this opinion, and orders have been issued to the Prefect of Calais to investigate the matter.
