We'll meet with friend to cheer us some,

And so with old acquaintances-How we will sometimes meet with one

And valleys of Nashwaak, To breathe the air as freshly made,-Or, may be, shoot the hawk; When, lo! right on the mountain top, Just as I knocked one down,

Came, unexpected as a ghost,

My friend Sir Roger Brown.

Sir Brown! can I believe my eyes? Can this indeed be he? I winked and rubbed my eyes, I did, That I might clearly see.

He then began to say. "Don't you remember at Woodstock The Nomination Day?" "That was a day indeed," said I,

"But what of it just now?" "O, nothing! but you've surely heard Of that bit little row?" I opened wide my eyes and looked-Why no: what can it be?"

"Ha! some crusty, female old maid 1s raving mad," said he. And not content with feeling mad, She thought she'd cut a dash,-

With written on them "Trash."

Sent back your lines to E. C. S.

"No doubt to vent her spite and spleen," Said I, and laughed out quite. "That's splendid! but I hope that she, Poor thing! feels now quite right."

That when we take a carte, The Sun does all the limming shown," Said Roger, with sure art. And if men should at any time, Persist in making faces,

"I hope at least she does perceive

He will their very likeness take And show them their grimaces. And if they call it Trash, then why, It's nothing to the sun; It's only they themselves thus shown-

You pictured them just as they were, Thus giving them a lash; And now this humble lady—good! Would write upon them, "Trash!"

Perhaps you think me too severe,

But what I've said is right.

The very deeds they've done.

I only wish that people would All know themselves by sight. For then they might amend their faults, And make themselves so pretty, That there would no occasion be

That all may something of themselves, And of their failings, know; And guard against them constantly, As they'd a subtle foe." So said Sir Roger merrily,

And then he went away,-But promised his advice to give, If needed, any day. Without remark or comment, then, To her that cut the dash I send his lines—to praise them, chi

Conservative party to "have a Centre Association, and branches in every city, town and village in the Dominion, for the purpose of thwarting the designs of an energetic and resolute political organization which has its ramifications everywhere." The importance of preventing the Opposition controlling the municipal elections is pointed out, and the assertion made that Grit political machinery is systematically brought to bear on them now. It truly says that "the only way we can ensure the unity and success of a party is by having an organization so perfected that it will be ever ready to move, whether the necessity arises at Municipal, Provincial or Dominion elections. The practice is not un-British for we all know that there are great clubs and associations in England which take all the management of such political matters in their own hands, and thereby save the leaders of the great parties an amount of work which ought never to fall Iowa has 1,500,000 pigs ready for turning upon them."
